b b, The wheels. c c, The brake-blocks of hard-wood, acted on by levers worked by the screw d, turned by the hand-wheel e.

contrivance for retarding or arresting machinery in motion by means of friction. It generally consists of a simple or compound lever, pressing forcibly upon the periphery of a broad wheel, fixed upon one of the shafts or axes of the machine. A similar contrivance is attached to the wheels of road and railway carriages which have the motion of their wheels retarded or stopped by their pressure. Continuous brakes applied to every pair of wheels in a railway train, and worked by steam and compressed air, are now largely used in railways. The name is also used to designate a form of dynamometer, called Prony's Friction-brake, for measuring the power yielded by water-wheels, &c.—10. An ancient instrument of torture, also called the Duke of Exeter's Daughter.

Branchiæ (brang'ki-ē), n. pl. [L. branchiæ, pl. of branchia, Gr. branchia, pl. of branchion, gills.] The respiratory organs of fishes, &c. See GILL.

Branchial (brang'ki-al), a. Relating to the branchiæ or gills; performed by means of branchiæ.

Branchiata (brang-ki-ā'ta), n. pl. Same as Branchiogasteropoda.

Branchiate (brang'ki-āt), a. Having branchiæ or gills.

Branchifera (brang-kif'ėr-a), n. 1. In the system of Blainville, a division of univalve molluscs belonging to the order Cervicobranchiata, equivalent to the family Fissurellidæ.—2. Same as Branchiogasteropoda.

Branchiness (bransh'i-nes), n. The quality of being branchy; the being full of branches.

Branching (bransh'ing), a. Furnished with branches; shooting out branches.

> Not thrice your branching limes have blown
> Since I beheld young Lawrence dead. Tennyson.

Branchiogasteropoda (brang'ki-o-gas'tėr-op''o-da), n. pl. [Gr. branchia, gills, and gasteropoda (which see).] A division of gasteropodous Mollusca, constructed to breathe air by means of water. Respiration may be effected in three ways—first, the blood may be simply exposed to the water in the thin walls of the mantle-cavity as in some of the Heteropoda; secondly, the respiratory organs may be in the form of outward processes of the integument, exposed in tufts on the back and sides of the animal, as in the Nudibranchiata, such as the sea-slugs, &c.; and thirdly, the respiratory organs may be in the form of pectinated or plume-like branchiæ, contained in a more or less complete branchial chamber formed by an inflection of the mantle, as in the whelks, &c. The Branchiogasteropoda fall into two distinct series, of which the one is hermaphrodite, the gills in this division being placed towards the rear of the body. In the other section the sexual organs are in distinct individuals. The Branchiogasteropoda are divided into three orders—(a) Prosobranchiata (sexes distinct, gills inclosed), as whelks, &c. (b) Opisthobranchiata (sexes united in the same individual, gills exposed), as sea-slugs, &c. (c) Heteropoda (free-swimming gasteropods), as Carinaria.

Branchiopod (brang'ki-o-pod), n. An animal belonging to the order Branchiopoda.

Branchiopoda (brang-ki-op'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. branchia, gills, and pous, podos, a foot.] An order of crustaceous animals, so called because their branchiæ, or gills, are situated on the feet. They have one to three masticating jaws, and the head is not distinct from the thorax, which is much reduced in size. They are divided into the families Cladocera, Phyllopoda, Ostracoda, and Trilobita. In the Ostracoda the body is inclosed in a bivalve shell.

Branchiopodous (brang-ki-op'o-dus), a. Gill-footed; belonging to the order Branchiopoda.

Branchiostegal (brang-ki-os'te-gal), a. See BRANCHIOSTEGOUS.

Branchiostegal (brang-ki-os'te-gal), n. A gill ray.

Branchiostegan (brang-ki-os'te-gan), n. An individual of the Branchiostegi.

Branchiostege (brang-ki-os'tēj), n. [Gr. branchia, gills, and stegos, a covering.] The membrane which covers the gills of fishes, lying beneath the operculum. It is supported by rays, to which the name is also applied.

Branchiostegi (brang'ki-ō-stēj-e), n. pl. [See BRANCHIOSTEGOUS.] A Linnæan tribe of cartilaginous fishes, comprehending those in which the gills are free and covered by a membrane. It includes the sturgeon and chimæra.

Branchiostegous (brang-ki-os'te-gus), a. Having gill-covers, or covered gills; as, a branchiostegous fish; covering the gills; as, the branchiostegous membrane.

Branchiostoma (brang-ki-os'to-ma), n. [Gr. branchia, gills, and stoma, mouth.] A genus of fishes, also called Amphioxus, including the lancelet (B. lanceolatum or Amphioxus lanceolatus) the most anomalous of all living fishes and of all vertebrated animals. Although recognized as a vertebrated animal it has no vertebræ, but only a persistent notochord, no definite brain, no true heart, no eyes, nor proper bones, the muscles being attached to soft cartilage, and no proper fins. It is a fish with the respiratory system of an ascidian and the circulatory system almost of an annelid. It is about 2 inches in length, semi-transparent, of a lanceolate form, tapering to each extremity, and having, instead of fins, a narrow membranous border running along the whole of the dorsal and part of the ventral surface, and expanding at the tail to form a lancet-shaped caudal fin. The mouth is a longitudinal fissure surrounded by a cartilaginous ring bearing a number of filaments. This species was first discovered on the coasts of Britain. It frequents the coasts of England, Ireland, the Firth of Clyde, and the Mediterranean, and another species has been found near the Philippine Islands; so that the geographical range of the genus is very extensive. This genus constitutes an order of itself—the Leptocardii or Pharyngobranchii.

Branchireme (brang'ki-rēm), n. [Gr. branchia, gills, and L. remus, an oar.] A crustacean having branchial legs or legs with branchiæ attached to them; a branchiopod.

Branch-leaf (bransh'lēf), n. A leaf growing on a branch.

Branchless (bransh'les), a. Destitute of branches or shoots; barren; bare; naked.

> If I lose mine honour,
> I lose myself: better I were not yours
> Than yours so branchless. Shak.

Branchlet (bransh'let), n. A little branch; a twig; the subdivision of a branch.

Branch-line (bransh'līn), n. A subordinate line of railway branching off from the main line.

Branch-peduncle (bransh'pē-dung-kl), n. A peduncle springing from a branch.

Branch-pilot (bransh'pī-lot), n. A pilot approved by the Trinity House, and holding a branch or diploma for a particular navigation. See BRANCH, S.

Branchy (bransh'i), a. 1. Full of branches; having wide-spreading branches.

> The fat earth feed thy branchy root. Tennyson.

2. Embowered in or overshadowed by branches. 'The woodman's branchy hut.' J. Baillie.

Brand (brand), n. [A. Sax. brand, a burning, a sword, from brinnan, to burn; Icel. brandr, a fire-brand, a sword-blade; Dan. brand, a fire-brand; D. brand, a burning; M.H.G. brant, a brand, a sword; G. brand, a burning, a conflagration, a blight. The sword-blade is so called from its gleaming flash. See BURN.] 1. A burning piece of wood, or a stick or piece of wood partly burned, whether burning or after the fire is extinct.

> Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? Zec. iii. 2.

2. A sword. 'Drew he forth the brand Excalibur.' Tennyson. [Poetical.]—3. Lightning; hence, a thunderbolt. 'A brand from heaven.' Shak.—4. A mark made by burning with a hot iron, as upon a cask, to indicate the quality, manufacturer, and the like, of its contents; a trade-mark; hence, quality; kind; as, brandy of a good brand. Also, a mark made in other ways than by burning, as by being cut in a log of wood or painted on sheep or other stock.—5. A mark put upon criminals with a hot iron, generally to indicate the character of their crime and for identification; hence, any mark of infamy; a stigma. 'The brand of private vice.' Channing.

> Tories and Whigs had concurred . . . in putting a brand on Ludlow. Macaulay.

6. A disease in vegetables by which their leaves and tender bark are partially destroyed as if they had been burned. It is supposed to arise from a sudden change of temperature after sunrise. Called also Burn.

Brand (brand), v.t. 1. To burn or impress a mark upon with a hot iron; as, to brand a criminal by way of punishment or for future identification; to brand a cask or anything else for the purpose of fixing a mark upon it; also, to mark with a pigment; as, to brand sheep.—2. To fix a mark or character of infamy upon; to stigmatize as infamous; as, to brand a vice with infamy. 'Enormities branded and condemned by the first and most natural verdict of common humanity.' South. [Branding was formerly a punishment for various offences, but is now abolished in Britain.]

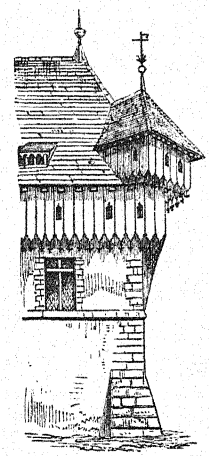
Bretèche, Bretesche (bret-āsh), n. [Fr. bretèche, O.Fr. bretesche. See BRATTICE, BUTTRESS.] A name common to several wooden, crenellated, and roofed erections, used in the middle ages for military purposes. Erections bearing this name were used in sieges both by the assailants and besieged: by the former, to afford protection while they were undermining the walls, for which purpose they were made with a strong roof; by the latter, to form defences behind breaches, for which purpose they were made much on the principle of the modern cheval de frise. Later, the name was more specifically given to a sort of roofed wooden balcony or cage, crenellated and machicolated, attached by corbels, sometimes immediately over a gateway, to add to its defence, and sometimes projecting from the angle of a building where the wall meets the roof, and standing out from the latter somewhat like a storm-window, so that it commanded three directions—in front and to the right and left—thus serving for observation as well as defence. The bretèche over a hotel-de-ville was sometimes used as a convenient place to read proclamations from.



Bretèche, Council-house, Constance.

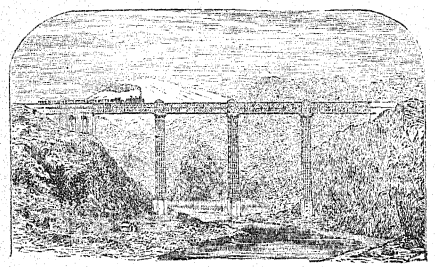
Bridge (brij), n. [A. Sax. brieg, bryeg, O.E. brig, brigge (also brug, brugge), Sc. brig or brigg; Icel. bryggja, Dan. brygge, a pier or landing stage; D. brug, G. brücke, a bridge. From a shorter form seen in Icel. brú, Dan. bro, a bridge. Root doubtful.] 1. Any structure of wood, stone, brick, or iron, raised over a river, pond, lake, road, valley, or the like, for the purpose of a convenient passage. Among rude nations bridges are sometimes formed of other materials, and sometimes they are formed of boats or logs of wood lying on the water, fastened together, covered with planks, and called floating bridges. A bridge over a marsh may be made of logs or other materials laid upon the surface of the earth. In suspension or chain bridges, the flooring or main body of the bridge is supported on strong iron chains or rods hanging in the form of an inverted arch from one point of support to another. The points of support are the tops of strong pillars or small towers, erected for the purpose at each extremity of the bridge. Over these pillars the chains pass, and are attached beyond them to rocks or massive frames of iron firmly secured under-with cross-framing, like lattice-work, so arranged that the head of one rafter is over the bases of the two adjoining rafters. Some lattice bridges are constructed with trussed rafters, like roofs, with a king-post or hanger in the centre; others with diagonal braces united by strong pins, and without suspension-rods. These bridges are constructed both of wood and iron. Many very large wood bridges of this kind have been erected in America, that over the Susquehanna being 1¼ mile long.—2. The upper part of the nose.—3. In engraving, a board resting on end-cleats on which the engraver in working rests his hand, which is thus supported clear above the plate.—4. In furnaces of different kinds, a low wall or vertical partition for compelling the flame and heated vapour to ascend.—5. In gun. the two pieces of timber which go between the two transoms of a gun-carriage.—6. In metal. the platform or staging by which ore, fuel, &c., are conveyed to the mouth of a smelting-furnace.—7. In musical instruments, the part of a stringed instrument over which the strings are stretched, and by which they are raised above the sounding-board. In bow instruments, such as the violin, the bridge is arched in order to allow the bow to impinge on any one string without touching the others.—8. Naut. an elevated gangway extending from side to side of a steamship, usually about the middle of the vessel, between the paddle-boxes in a vessel with paddle-wheels, and serving as a post for the person directing the course of the ship.



Lattice-bridge on Railway from St. Gall to Appenzell.

Bridge (brij), n. [Said to be of Russian origin, an earlier form being britch or biritch.] A card-game which seems to be a development of whist, being played by four persons, but there are important differences in regard to play, value of cards, scoring, &c.

Bridge (brij), v.t. pret. & pp. bridged; ppr. bridging. 1. To build a bridge or bridges on or over; as, to bridge a river.—2. To make a bridge or bridges for.

> Xerxes . . . over Hellespont
> Bridging his way, Europe with Asia joined.

Broella (brō-el'la), n. A coarse kind of cloth used for the ordinary dresses of countrymen and the monastic clergy in the middle ages.

Brog (brog), n. [Ir. and Gael.] A pointed instrument, as a shoemaker's awl.

Brog (brog), v.t. [Scotch.] 1. To prick with a sharp-pointed instrument; as, to brog leather.—2. To push or thrust. 'Brogging an elshin through bend leather.' Sir W. Scott.

Brogan (brō'gan), n. A stout coarse shoe; the same as Brogue (which see).

Broggle† (brog'l), v.i. [Dim. of brog, which according to Halliwell is to catch eels by brogs or small sticks.] To fish for eels by troubling the water. Wright.

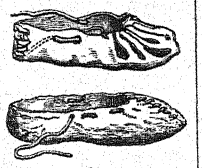
Brogue (brōg), n. [Ir. and Gael. brog, a sort of shoe made of the rough hide of any beast. From this shoe being used by the wilder Irish the word came to designate their manner of speaking English.] 1. A coarse and light kind of shoe made of raw or half-tanned leather, of one entire piece, and gathered round the foot by a thong; a stout, coarse shoe. 'My clouted brogues.' Shak.—2. A dialectical manner of pronunciation; especially used of the mode of pronunciation peculiar to the Irish.



Irish Brogues.

In the House of Commons, the Scotch accent and the Irish brogue may be often heard. Quart. Rev.

Brogue (brōg), n. A trick. Burns. [Scotch.]

Brogues† (brōgz), n. pl. [See BREECHES.] Breeches. Shenstone.

Broid† (broid), v.t. To braid. See BRAID.

Broider (broi'dėr), v.t. [Fr. broder, derived by Littré from Armor. broud, a needle, whence brouder, to broider; comp. Ir. and Gael. brod, a point, a prickle. Others, however, regard Fr. broder as a modified form of O.Fr. border, Sp. and Pg. bordar, to embroider, originally to form an ornamental border, from Fr. bord. See BORDER.] To adorn with figures of needlework, or by sewing on pearls, or the like; to embroider. 'A broidered coat.' Ex. xxviii. 4. 'A red sleeve broider'd with pearls.' Tennyson. [Obsolete or poetical.]

Broiderer (broi'dėr-ėr), n. One that embroiders.

Broideress (broi'dėr-es), n. A female who embroiders. Hood.

Broidery (broi'dėr-i), n. Embroidery; ornamental needle-work wrought upon cloth. 'Rare broidery of the purple clover.' Tennyson. [Obsolete or poetical.]

Broke (brōk), v.i. pret. & pp. broked; ppr. broking. [From the noun broker, O. Fr. brokeor, brokiere, from a verb meaning to tap, the broker being first a tapster, then a retailer, &c. See BROACH.] 1. To transact business for another in trade; to act as agent in buying and selling and other commercial business; to carry on the business of a broker.—2.† To act as a go-between or procurer in love matters; to pimp.

We do want a certain necessary woman to broke between them, Cupid said. Fanshaw.

3.† To transact business by means of an agent.

But the gains of bargains are of a more doubtful nature; when men shall wait upon others' necessity, broke by servants and instruments to draw them on . . . and the like practices. Bacon.

Broke (brōk). 1. Pret. of break.—2. Obsolescent or poetical pp. of break.

And the widows of Asher are loud in their wail,
And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal.
Byron.

As late as 1816 convicts were broke on the wheel. Brougham.

Broked, a. Same as Brocked. [Scotch.]

Broken (brōk'n), pp. of break, often used as an a. 1. Parted by violence; separated into fragments.—2. Not integral or entire; fractional: opposed to round, as applied to numbers.

This new-created income of two millions will probably furnish £665,000 (I avoid broken numbers). Burke.

3. Subdued; humble; contrite; with feelings crushed.

The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. Ps. li. 17.

4. Violated; transgressed; as, a broken vow. 5. Made weak; infirm; with strength gone: often with down; as, a broken down debauchee. 'So brown, so bow'd, so broken.' Tennyson.—6. Jonson.*—Broken meat, fragments of meat.—Broken man, an outlaw; vagabond; public depredator. [Scotch.]—Broken colours, in painting, colours produced by the mixture of one or more pigments.—Broken water, waves breaking on and near shallows, or by the contention of currents in a narrow channel.

Broken-backed (brōk'n-bakt), a. Having a broken back, in any of the senses of the word; in extract below, having a crack down the back from rough usage.

Yellow, thumbed, devastated by flies and time, stained with spots of oil and varnish, broken-backed, dog's-eared—a sorry lazar-house copy, which no bookstall-keeper would look at. G. A. Sala.

Broken-bellied (brōk'n-bel-lid), a. Having a ruptured belly; broken down; degenerate. 'Such is our broken-bellied age.' Sir E. Sandys. [Rare.]

Broken-hearted (brōk'n-härt-ed), a. Having the spirits depressed or crushed by grief or despair.

He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted.
Is. lxi. 1.

Brokenly (brōk'n-li), adv. 1. In a broken interrupted manner; without a regular series.—2. In broken or imperfect language.

If you will love me soundly with your French heart, I will be glad to hear you confess it brokenly with your English tongue. Shak.

Brokenness (brōk'n-nes), n. The state of being broken.—Brokenness of heart, the state of having the spirits crushed by grief or despair; abject mental misery. 'Helpless, hopeless, brokenness of heart.' Byron.

Nor was this submission the effect of content, but of mere stupefaction and brokenness of heart. The iron had entered into his soul. Macaulay.

Broken-wind (brōk'n-wind), n. A disease in horses, often accompanied with an enlargement of the lungs and heart, which disables them for bearing fatigue. In this disease the expiration of the air from the lungs occupies double the time that the inspiration of it does; it requires also two efforts rapidly succeeding to each other, attended by a slight spasmodic action, in order fully to accomplish it. It is caused by rupture of the air-cells, and there is no known cure for it.

Broken-winded (brōk'n-wind-ed), a. Having short breath or disordered respiration, as a horse.

Broker (brō'kėr), n. [See BROKE.] 1. One who brokes; an agent or negotiator who is employed by merchants to make and conclude bargains for them for a fee or rate per cent., or who transacts other business for his employers. Brokers are of several kinds—Exchange-brokers, Pawn-brokers, Ship-brokers, Stock-brokers, &c. See under these headings.—2. One who deals in second-hand household goods, clothes, and the like. 3.† A pimp or procurer.

Hence broker, lackey, ignomy and shame
Pursue thy life. Shak.

Brokerly† (brō'kėr-li), a. Mean; servile. 'A brokerly slave.' B. Jonson.

Brokery† (brō'kėr-i), n. The business of a broker. Marlowe.

Broking (brōk'ing), a. 1. Engaged as a broker.—2. Pertaining to the business of a broker, as a pawnbroker. 'Redeem from broking pawn the blemished crown.' Shak.

Brokking,† ppr. [From break, broke; with a broken voice.] Throbbing; quavering.

He singeth brokking as a nightingale. Chaucer.

Broma (brō'ma), n. [Gr. brōma, food.] 1. Aliment.—2. A chocolate preparation from the cocoa seeds or beans.

Bromal (brō'mal), n. A compound obtained by the action of bromine on alcohol. It is a colourless oily fluid, of a penetrating odour, which attacks the eyes.

Bromate (brō'māt), n. A salt formed of bromic acid.

Bromatology (brō-ma-tol'o-ji), n. [Gr. brōma, brōmatos, food, and logos, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on aliments.

Brome (brōm), n. Same as Bromine.

Brome-grass (brōm'-gras), n. The name popularly given to grasses of the genus Bromus (which see).

Bromeliaceæ (brō-mē'li-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of endogenous plants, taking its name from the genus (Bromelia, so called after a Swedish botanist, Olaus Bromel) to which the pine-apple was once incorrectly referred, and consisting of herbaceous plants remarkable for the hardness and dryness of their gray foliage. They abound in tropical America, commonly growing epiphytically on the branches of trees. With the exception of the pine-apple (Ananassa sativa) the Bromeliaceæ are of little value, but some species are cultivated in hothouses in this country for the beauty of their flowers. They can exist in dry hot air without contact with the earth, and in hothouses are often kept hung in moist moss.

Bromic (brō'mik), a. Pertaining to bromine.—Bromic acid, a compound of oxygen and bromine.

Bromide (brō'mīd or brō'mid), n. A compound formed by the union of bromine with another element.

Bromine (brō'mīn or brō'min), n. [Gr. brōmos, a fetid odour.] Sym. Br. At. wt. 80. A simple non-metallic element discovered in 1826 by Balard of Montpellier. In its general chemical habitudes it much resembles chlorine and iodine, and is generally associated with them. It exists, but in very minute quantities, in sea-water, in the ashes of marine plants, in animals, and in some salt springs. It is usually extracted from bittern by the agency of chlorine. At common temperatures it is a very dark reddish liquid of a powerful and suffocating odour, and emitting red vapour. It has bleaching powers like chlorine, and is very poisonous. It combines with hydrogen to form hydrobromic acid gas. With oxygen it forms bromic acid. Its combinations are termed bromides. Its density is about four and a half times that of water.

Bromite (brōm'īt), n. See BROMYRITE.

Bromize (brō'mīz), v.t. In photog. to prepare or treat with bromine.

Bromoform (brō'mo-form), n. [E. bromine, and L. formica, an ant.] ($CHBr_3$.) A limpid liquid produced by bromine with caustic potash acting on wood-spirits or alcohol, analogous to chloroform, but containing bromine in place of chlorine.

Bromography (brō-mog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. brōma, food, and graphō, to write.] A term for a treatise or dissertation on food. [Rare.]

Bromus (brō'mus), n. [Gr. bromos.] A genus of grasses; the brome-grasses. Nearly 200 species have been described. Of these eight are enumerated by British botanists; they are known by having their spikelets many-flowered, two awnless glumes to each floret, two paleæ or valves, the lowermost of which has a rough, straight, rigid awn proceeding from below the tip of the valve. They are not held in much estimation by the farmer, but an Australian species, B. Schraderi, is strongly recommended as a forage plant.

Bromyrite (brō'mi-rīt), n. Native bromide of silver, consisting of 57·5 parts silver and 42·5 bromine, of a yellowish-green colour, occurring at Huelgot, in Brittany, in Mexico, and Chili, accompanying other ores of silver. Called sometimes Bromite.

Bronchi, pl. of bronchus (which see).

Bronchia (brong'ki-a), n. pl. [Gr. and L.] The two tubes, with their subdivisions or ramifications, arising from the bifurcation of the trachea or wind-pipe in the lungs, and conveying air to the latter; the bronchi. See LUNG.

Bronchial (brong'ki-al), a. Belonging to the bronchi or bronchia.—The bronchial arteries are branches of the superior descending aorta accompanying the bronchia.—Bronchial glands, glands at the division of the bronchia.—Bronchial tubes, the minute ramifications of the bronchia, terminating in the bronchial cells, or air-cells of the lungs.—Bronchial membrane, the mucous membrane lining the bronchia.

Bronchic (brong'kik), a. Same as Bronchial.

Bronchitis (brong-kī'tis), n. [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe, and term. -itis, signifying inflammation.] In med. an inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchia, or tubes which convey air to the lungs; a complaint of very frequent occurrence. It is of two kinds, acute and chronic. It is also a very serious disease among quadrupeds.

Bronchocele (brong'kō-sēl), n. [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe, and kēlē, a tumour.] Same as Goitre.

Bronchophony (brong-kof'o-ni), n. [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe, and phōnē, voice.] In med. a loud, clear, thrilling sound, seeming as if close to the ear of the hearer when applied to the patient's chest, or as if the patient spoke through his ribs.

Bronchotome (brong'ko-tōm), n. In surg. a kind of lancet, with a blunt and rounded point used in the operation of bronchotomy.

Bronchotomy (brong-kot'o-mi), n. [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe, and tomē, a cutting.] In surg. an incision into the wind-pipe or larynx between the rings, to afford a passage for the air into and out of the lungs when any disease prevents respiration in the usual way, or to extract foreign bodies which have got into the trachea, or in cases of suffocation, drowning, &c. The operation is called tracheotomy when the opening is made into the trachea, and laryngotomy when made into the larynx.

Bronchus (brong'kus), n. pl. Bronchi (brong'kī). [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe.] One of the bifurcations of the trachea. See TRACHEA, LUNG.

Brond† (brond), n. A brand; a sword. Spenser.

Bronteum (bron-tē'um), n. [Gr. bronteion, from brontē, thunder.] In ancient Greek theatres, a brazen vessel used for imitating thunder by rolling stones in it.

Brontolith (bron'tō-lith), n. [Gr. brontē, thunder, and lithos, a stone.] An aerolite; meteorolite.

Brontology (bron-tol'o-ji), n. [Gr. brontē, thunder, and logos, discourse.] A discourse or dissertation upon thunder.

Brontozoum (bron-tō-zō'um), n. [Gr. brontēs, a giant, and zōon, a living creature.] A name given to the animal producing certain gigantic bird-like footprints, some being 20 inches long, occurring in the new red sandstone of Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Bronze (bronz), n. [Fr. bronze, from It. bronzo, bronze; allied to brown, brand, &c., being from Teut. root bren, to burn.] 1. A compound or alloy of from 2 to 20 parts of copper to 1 of tin, to which other metallic substances are sometimes added, especially zinc. It is brittle, hard, and sonorous, and used for statues, bells, and cannon, the proportions of the respective ingredients being varied to suit the particular purposes. Ancient bronze generally contains 4 to 15 per cent. of tin. The alloy of our present bronze coinage consists of 94 parts of copper, 4 of tin, and 1 of zinc.—2. Any statue or bust, urn, medal, or other work of art, cast of bronze, whether original or a copy of an antique. 'A print, a bronze, a flower, a root.' Prior.—3. A brown colour resembling bronze; a pigment prepared for the purpose of imitating bronze, of two kinds, the yellow and the red. The yellow is made of fine copper dust; the red of copper dust with a little pulverized red ochre.—4. Boldness; impudence; brass.

Imbrowned with native bronze, lo, Henley stands, Tuning his voice and balancing his hands. Pope.

—Imitation bronze, tombac, prince's metal, or Mannheim gold, terms applied to alloys of zinc and copper, containing 80 per cent. or more of copper. From zinc being cheaper than tin, these alloys are much used instead of true bronze for ornaments, which are gilt or artificially bronzed over the surface. These terms are also applied to alloys of copper with zinc, tin, and lead. An alloy of about 85 parts copper, 11 zinc, and 4 tin, is used for statues.—Bronze age, in archæol. the age between the stone age and the iron age. (See AGE.) In the bronze age the implements were of copper or bronze; the dead were burned, and their ashes deposited in urns or stone-chests, covered with conical mounds of earth or cairns of stones. Gold and amber ornaments appear in this age, but never silver.

Bronze (bronz), v.t. pret. & pp. bronzed; ppr. bronzing. 1. To make brown or of the colour of bronze, as by exposure to the sun.

Seamed with an ancient sword-cut on the cheek,
And bruised and bronzed. Tennyson.

Specifically—2. To make anything resemble bronze by means of copper dust, or leaf fastened on the outside, as gold-leaf is in gilding.—3. To harden or make like bronze; hence, to make hard or unfeeling. 'The lawyer who bronzes his bosom instead of his forehead.'—Sir W. Scott.

Bronzed-skin Disease. Same as Addison's Disease.

Bronze-liquor (bronz'lik-ėr), n. A solution of chloride of antimony and sulphate of copper, used for bronzing gun-barrels, &c.

Bronze-powder (bronz'pou-dėr), n. A metallic powder, mixed with oil-paint, for colouring objects in imitation of bronze. The yellow is composed of pulverized brass and the red of pulverized copper.

Bronze-steel (bronz'stēl), n. The name given to bronze condensed and hardened by a method which has been adopted in the making of cannon. The piece is first cast in bronze in the ordinary way, and its bore is afterwards widened by forcing in several strong steel cylinders in succession. When so treated the bronze next the bore is said to acquire a tenacity approaching that of cast-steel.

Bronze-wing (bronz'wing), n. A name for certain species of Australian pigeons, chiefly of the genus Phaps, distinguished by the bronze colour of their plumage. The common bronze-winged ground-dove (P. chalcoptera) abounds in all the Australian colonies, and is a plump bird, often weighing a pound, much esteemed for table.

Bronzine (bronz'in), a. Resembling bronze; bronze-coloured.

Bronzist (bronz'ist), n. One who casts bronzes or lacquers metals, plaster-figures, &c., to give them the appearance of bronze.

Bronzite (bronz'īt), n. A mineral, a variety of diallage, nearly allied to Labrador hornblende or hypersthene. It has a yellowish-brown colour, and semi-metallic lustre approaching to that of bronze. It is a silicate of magnesia and iron.

Bronzy (bronz'i), a. Resembling bronze; as, a bronzy appearance.

Broom (bröm), n. [A. Sax. bróm, L.G. brâm, broom; D. brem, broom, furze; closely allied to bramble, both being, according to Max Müller, from same root as Skr. bhram, to whirl, to be confused. See BRAMBLE, BRIM.] 1. The popular name of various plants. The common broom (Cytisus Scoparius) is a leguminous shrub growing abundantly on sandy pastures and heaths in Britain and throughout Europe. It is distinguished by having large, yellow, papilionaceous flowers, leaves in threes, and single, and the branches angular. Spanish broom is Spartium junceum, and butcher's-broom is Ruscus aculeatus. See BUTCHER'S-BROOM.—2. A besom or brush with a long handle for sweeping floors: so called from being originally made of the broom-plant. A broom at the masthead of a vessel indicates that she is for sale, derived probably from the old habit of displaying boughs at shops and taverns.

Broom (bröm), v.t. Same as Bream.

Broom-corn, Broom-grass (bröm'korn, bröm'gras), n. Sorghum vulgare or Guinea-corn, with a jointed stem, like a reed or the stem of maize, rising to the height of 8 or 10 feet. The branched panicles are made into carpet-brooms and clothes-brushes.

Brora-beds (brō'ra-bedz), n. pl. In geol. a series of strata occurring near Brora, Sutherlandshire, of the age of the lower oolite, remarkable for containing a seam of good coal 3½ feet thick, which is the thickest bed of true coal found in the secondary strata of Britain.

Brose (brōz), n. [Gael. brothas, brose; same root as brew, broth, &c.] A Scotch dish, made by pouring boiling water, boiling milk, the liquor in which meat has been boiled, or the like, on oatmeal, barley-meal, or other meal, and immediately mixing the ingredients by stirring. Sometimes butter is added to the meal, and when the brose is made with water sweet milk is generally added. The dish is denominated from the nature of the liquid; as, kail-brose, water-brose, beef-brose, &c.—A thole-brose is a somewhat different dish.

Brosen,† Brosten† (bros'n), pp. Burst.

Brosimum (brō'si-mum), n. A genus of Artocarpaceæ, one species of which (B. Galactodendron) is the cow-tree of South America. B. Alicastrum (the bread-nut tree), common in the woods of Jamaica, produces nuts which, when roasted, are used as bread, and taste like hazel-nuts. The wood resembles mahogany, and is sometimes used by cabinet-makers. The leaves and young branches form a most useful fattening fodder for cattle. The snake or leopard wood, used as veneers and for walking-canes, is yielded by a species (B. Aubletii) from British Guiana.

Brosmius (bros'mi-us), n. A genus of fishes belonging to the cod family (Gadidæ). One species has been found on our northern coasts, commonly called the torsk or tusk.

Broth (broth), n. [A. Sax. broth, Icel. broth; from root of brew.] Liquor in which flesh is boiled and macerated, usually with certain vegetables to give it a better relish. In Scotland the name is seldom applied unless pot barley forms one of the ingredients.

Good broth, with good keeping, do much now and then;
Good diet, with wisdom, best comforteth men.
Tusser.

Brothel (broth'el), n. [Usually regarded as another form of bordel (which see), but Skeat shows that this is probably a mistake, brothel being originally a person. He derives brothel, as well as a parallel form, O.E. brethel, a wretch, from same root as A. Sax. ábrothen, degenerate, base, viz. from root brut, to break, as in E. brittle, though he admits that there was early a confusion between brothel and bordel.] A house of lewdness; a house appropriated to the purposes of prostitution; a bawdy-house; a stew.

Epicurism and lust
Make it more like a tavern or a brothel
Than a graced palace. Shak.

Bud (bud), n. [Allied to D. bot, a bud; O.Fr. boter, to bud; Fr. bouton, a bud; E. button.] 1. A small protuberance on the stem or branches of a plant, composed of a solid conical base supporting a number of rudimentary leaves or flowers. In the leaf-bud the conical base represents the future stem with its internodes yet undeveloped, and the rudimentary leaves are all either the future leaves (as in so-called naked buds), or some of the outer ones are modified, forming protective scales which fall off when the bud is expanded.—2. A prominence on or in certain animals of low organization, as polyps, which becomes developed into an independent being, which may or may not remain permanently attached to the parent organism.

Bud (bud), v.i. pret. & pp. budded; ppr. budding. 1. To put forth or produce buds. Job xiv. 9.—2. To be in the condition of a bud; to sprout; to begin to grow or to issue from a stock in the manner of a bud, as a horn.—3. Fig. to be in an early stage of development.

Bud (bud), v.t. To insert the bud of a plant under the bark of another tree, for the purpose of raising upon any stock a species of fruit or flower different from that of the stock; as, to bud a garden-rose on a brier-stock; or, to bud a brier-stock with a garden-rose. See BUDDING, n.

Buddha (böd'da), n. [Skr. buddha, wise, from buddh, to know.] The Wise or the Enlightened: the sacred name of the founder of Buddhism, who appears to have lived in the sixth century B.C. His religion formed a system opposed to the prevailing Brahmanism. See BUDDHISM.

Buddha, from a Burmese Bronze.

Buddhism (böd'izm), n. The religious system founded by Buddha, one of the most prominent doctrines of which is that nirvâna, or an absolute release from existence, is the chief good. According to it pain is inseparable from existence, and consequently pain can cease only through nirvâna; and in order to attain nirvâna our desires and passions must be suppressed, the most extreme self-renunciation practised, and we must, as far as possible, forget our own personality. From Buddhism involving a protest against caste distinctions it was eagerly adopted by the Dasyus or non-Aryan inhabitants of Hindustan. It was pure, moral, and humane in its origin, but it came subsequently to be mixed up with idolatrous worship of its founder and other deities. Although now long banished from Hindustan by the persecutions of the Brahmans, Buddhism prevails in Ceylon, Java, Cochin-China, Birmah, Tibet, Mongolia, Tartary, China, and Japan, and its adherents are said to comprise about a third of the human race.

Buddhist (böd'ist), n. A worshipper of Buddha; one who adheres to the system of Buddhism.

Buddhist, Buddhistic (böd'ist, böd-ist'ik), a. Relating to Buddha or to Buddhism.—Buddhist architecture, the oldest and only true native style of Indian ecclesiastical architecture, the earliest specimens dating to 250 B.C. The objects of Buddhist art may be classed into five groups: (a) Stambhas or lâts, bearing inscriptions on their shafts, with emblems or animals on their capitals. (b) Stupas or topes, a great number of which were built in the form of large towers, some in the form of hemispheres, others partly cylindrical and furnished with either a flat circle or pointed terminals like a dome at the top. These topes are supposed to have been erected at first to commemorate some event, or to show that the place was sacred; but afterwards they were employed to contain relics of the Buddha or of some noted saint. Where there are relics the tope is called a dagoba, or relic-shrine. (c) Rails, consisting of elaborately sculptured pillars, found surrounding topes, sacred trees, temples, pillars, and other objects. (d) Chaityas, churches or assembly halls, vast chambers cut out of the living rock, and corresponding in almost every respect with the churches of the Christian religion. Their plans, the position of the altar or relic casket, the aisles, the apse, and other peculiarities, are the same in both. (e) Viharas, or monasteries, also excavated from the solid rock, supported by pillars of the natural rock left in their places, and surrounded by a number of small sleeping-places or cells. One leading characteristic of the Buddhist style is a variety of arch, formed by each layer of stones overlapping that below it till the two sides approach so closely that the aperture at the top can be covered by a single stone or architrave. Buddhist architecture prevails also in Ceylon, Thibet, Java, and generally wherever this faith still maintains its existence.

Budding (bud'ing), a. 1. Producing buds; as, a budding tree.—2. Being in the condition of a bud; fig. being in an early stage of growth; being at the entrance of a period of life, a career, &c.; as, a budding orator. 'Young budding virgin.' Shak.

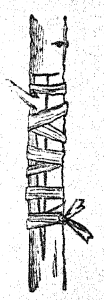
Budding (bud'ing), n. 1. The putting forth or producing of buds or gems. Specifically in zool. a name applied to the asexual process of reproduction, whereby new animals are produced by a process analogous to that of budding in plants. See GEMMATION.—2. In hort. a mode of grafting in which a leaf-bud is used as a graft instead of a young shoot. The bud thus introduced anastomoses with the stock, forms a stem, and becomes in all respects similar to the parent whence it was derived, retaining all its special peculiarities. Roses, plums, peaches, nectarines, cherries, and many other kinds of fruit are propagated in this way.



Budding.

Budding-knife (bud'ing-nīf), n. A knife used by gardeners in the operation of budding, the handle of which, usually made of bone or ivory, tapers to an edge, which enables it to be used in separating the bark from the wood of the stock and inserting the bud.

Buddingness (bud'ing-nes), n. State of budding.

Buddle (bud'l), n. [Comp. G. butteln, to shake.] In mining, a large square frame of boards used in washing metalliferous ore.

Buddle (bud'l), v.t. or i. In mining, to wash ore; to separate the metalliferous ores from earthy matters by means of an inclined hutch called a buddle, over which water flows.

Bude-burner (būd'bèrn-èr), n. [From Bude in Cornwall, the residence of Mr. Gurney, the inventor.] An arrangement consisting of two, three, or more concentric argand burners, each inner one rising a little above the outer, by which a very powerful light is produced.

Bude-light (būd'lit), n. [See BUDE-BURNER.] An exceedingly brilliant light, produced by directing a current of oxygen gas into the interior of the flame of an argand-lamp or gas-burner.

Budge (buj), v.i. [Fr. bouger, to stir or wag, to move, from bullicare, a hypothetical freq. from L. bullire, to boil, whence also It. bolicare, to bubble.] To move off; to stir; to wag; to flinch; to flee.

I will not budge for no man's pleasure. Shak.

Budge† (buj), a. [From budge, to move.] Brisk; jocund. South.

Budge (buj), n. [From O.Fr. bouge, L. bulga, a leather bag or sack, the Latin being from a Gallic word seen in Ir. and Gael. balg, bolg, a bag. See BELLOWS, BELLY.] 1.† A leathern bag.—2. Lamb-skin with the wool dressed outwards, formerly used as an ornamental border for scholastic habits.—3. Same as Budge-barrel.

Buff† (buf), v.t. [O.Fr. buffer, bufer, to strike, buffe, a blow.] To strike. 'A shock to have buffed out the blood.' B. Jonson.

Buff† (buf), n. [O. Fr. bufe, buffe, a blow. See the verb.] A blow; a stroke; a buffet. Spenser.—To stand buff, to endure blows without flinching; to confront without fear. Another origin is suggested for the phrase, viz. to stand stripped to the buff or skin like boxers.

And for the good old cause stood buff
'Gainst many a bitter kick and cuff. Hudibras.

Buffalo (buf'fa-lō), n. [From Sp. bufalo, Fr. buffle, L. bubalus, bufalus, from Gr. boubalos, from bous, an ox.] 1. A ruminant mammal, family Bovidæ, the best known species of which is the Bubalus Buffelus or Bos Bubalus, larger than the ox and with stouter limbs, originally from India, but now found in most of the warmer countries of the Eastern Continent. It is less docile than the common ox, and is fond of marshy places and rivers. It is, however, used in tillage, draught, and carriage in India, Italy, &c. The female gives much more milk than the cow, and from the milk the ghee or clarified butter of India is made. The Cape buffalo (Bubalus Caffer) is distinguished by the size of its horns, which are black and united at their bases, forming a great bony plate on the front of the head. It attains the size of an ordinary ox. The hide is exceedingly tough, and a valuable leather is prepared from it, but the flesh is not very highly esteemed. The name is also applied to wild oxen in general, and particularly to the bison of North America. See BISON.—2. A buffalo-robe (which see). 3. A fresh-water fish resembling the sucker. Bartlett. [United States.]

1, Head of Indian Buffalo (Bubalus Buffelus).
2, Head of Cape Buffalo (Bubalus Caffer).

Bull (bụl), n. [L. bulla, a boss, an ornament worn on a child's neck, later a leaden seal. Bullet, bullion, are from this word.] 1. Originally the seal appended to the edicts and briefs of the pope. Hence—2. A letter, edict, or rescript of the pope, published or transmitted to the churches over which he is head, containing some decree, order, or decision. It is used chiefly in matters of justice or of grace. If the former, the lead or seal is hung by a hempen cord; if the latter, by a silken thread. Up to the sixteenth century the seal or bulla was impressed on one side with the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, latterly with the arms of the pope; on the other with the name of the pope. The document is in Latin, and on parchment, the writing being in the old round Gothic letter.—Golden Bull, a name given to several celebrated historical documents; so called from their golden seal. The most notable of these is an edict or imperial constitution, made by the Emperor Charles IV. regulating the mode of procedure in the election and coronation of the emperor.—Leaden bulls were sent by the emperors of Constantinople to patriarchs and princes, and by the grandees of the Empire of France, Sicily, &c., and by patriarchs and bishops.—Waxen bulls were in frequent use with the Greek emperors, who thus sealed letters to their relations.

Bull (bul), n. [So named, it is conjectured, from the contrast implied in the pope in his bulls styling himself 'servant of servants,' while they convey absolutely dictatorial edicts. Compare extract from Milton below. The following adduces a different origin, however. 'The British Apollo, 1740, says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London in the reign of Henry VII., whose blundering in this way was notorious.' Brewer.] A gross inconsistency in language; a ludicrous blunder involving a contradiction in terms.

> And whereas the Papist boasts himself to be a Roman Catholic, it is a mere contradiction, one of the pope's bulls, as if he should say universal particular; a Catholic schismatic. Milton.

Bulla (bụl'la), n. [L. See BULL.] 1. An ornament worn round the neck by noble Roman children till they were seventeen years old; in later times, a leaden seal attached to a document.—2. Buntline-cloth (bunt'lin-kloth), n. Naut. the lining sewed up the sail in the direction of the buntline to prevent the sail being chafed.

Bunyon, Bunion (bun'yon) n. [From O.Fr. bugne, buigne, a lump, a swelling, perhaps through It. bugnone, a round knot, or bunch, a boil. Bun is of the same origin.] An excrescence or knob at the side of the ball of the great toe, arising from an inflammation of the small membranous sac called bursa mucosa.

Buoy (boi or bwoi), n. [D. boei, a buoy, a fetter, O.Fr. boye, from L. boiæ, a kind of fetter or shackle; a buoy being a floating object fettered at a fixed point.] 1. A floating object attached to something for a particular purpose; as, (a) a floating object fixed at a certain place to show the position of objects beneath the water, as shoals, rocks, &c., or to mark out the course a ship is to follow. (b) An empty cask or piece of wood employed to float a cable in rocky anchorages to keep it from chafing on the rocks, called more specifically a mooring or cable-buoy. Buoys are of various shapes and with various names, as can-buoys, in the form of a cone; nun-buoys, which are large in the middle, and tapering nearly to a point at each end; bell-buoys, consisting of an apparatus connected with a bell, which rings with the motion of the sea.—2. A floating object used to throw overboard for a person who has fallen into the water to lay hold of, and to keep him afloat till he can be taken out; more particularly called a life-buoy.

Buoys.—Drawn by Captain May.

1, Can-buoy. 2, Nun-buoy. 3, Bell-buoy. 4, Mooring-buoy.

Navy Life-buoy.—Royal Naval College, Greenwich.

The life-buoy now commonly used in the navy consists of two hollow copper vessels connected together, between which there stands up a hollow pole or mast, having a port-fire fixed to its top, as a beacon, and a lead weight at the lower end to act as ballast.

Buoy (boi or bwoi), v.t. 1. To keep afloat in a fluid; to bear up or keep from sinking in a fluid, as in water or air: generally with up.

There was heat enough in the air to buoy it (water in the state of vapour) up. Woodward.

Many a flowing range
Of vapour buoyed the crescent bark. Tennyson.

2. Fig. to support or sustain; to keep from sinking into despondency.

The recollection of the applause with which he had been greeted still buoyed up his spirits. Macaulay.

3. To fix buoys in as a direction to mariners; as, to buoy or to buoy off a channel.

Buoy (boi or bwoi), v.i. To float; to rise by specific lightness. [Rare.]

Buphaga (bū'fa-ga), n. [Gr. bous, an ox, and phagō, to eat.] A genus of insessorial African birds, family Sturnidæ (starlings), with short bills square at the base, and rather swollen towards the tip. The species are called beef-eaters or ox-peckers because they alight upon the backs of the cattle, and pick holes in the skin to get at the larvæ of the insects deposited directly below it. Two species are known, the B. africana of South Africa, and the B. erythrorhyncha of Madagascar.

Buprestidæ (bū-pres'ti-dē), n. pl. [Gr. boupr̄estis, a beetle which being eaten by cattle in the fields caused them to swell up and die; bous, an ox, pr̄ethein, to swell up, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of coleopterous insects, distinguished by the uncommon brilliancy and highly metallic splendour of their colours. The largest and most brilliant of these beetles are found chiefly in tropical climates; their larvæ are wood-eaters or wood-borers, and attack both fruit and forest trees. The golden elytra of some species, called golden-beetles, are used in Indian embroidery, and the lustrous leg-joints are strung into brilliant necklaces and bracelets. The family is divided into several genera. About 1200 species are known, which differ considerably in form among themselves. Four or five small species are found in this country.

Buprestidan (bū-pres'ti-dan), n. An individual of the Buprestidæ (which see).

Bur, Burr (bėr), n. [A. Sax. burr, a bur, a burdock; Dan. borre, Sw. kardborre, a burdock; the root is probably seen in Ir. borr, a knob, borraim, to swell. In meaning 11 the word may be of imitative origin.] 1. A rough prickly covering of the seeds of certain plants, as of the chestnut and burdock; also, the plant burdock. 'Rude burs and thistles.' Milton.—2. In engr. a slight ridge of metal raised on the edges of a line either engraved by the burin or the dry-point, and which is removed by a scraper, as it retains superfluous ink in printing a plate, and has the effect of a smear.—3. The rough neck left on a bullet in casting.—4. The round knob of a horn next a deer's head.—5. The lobe or lap of the ear.—6. A triangular chisel used to clear the corners of mortices. 7. Burglary (bėrg'la-ri), n. [From burglar.] The act or crime of nocturnal housebreaking, with an intent to commit a felony. To constitute this crime the act must be committed in the night, or when there is not daylight enough to discern a man's face. It must be in a dwelling-house, or in an adjoining building which is a part or parcel of the dwelling-house. There must be an actual breaking and an entry; but an opening made by the offender, as by taking out a pane of glass, or lifting a window, raising a latch, picking a lock, or removing any fastening, amounts to a breaking; and putting in of the hand, after such breaking, is an entry. The act must also be done with an intent to commit felony. In American law the term is applied to the criminal breaking into other buildings than dwelling-houses, whether by night or by day.

Burgle (bėr'gl), v.t. and i. To act or treat as a burglar does; commit burglary.

Most wretched, but from streams of mutual love,
And uncreated but for love divine. Young.

In this sense but is very common after all and cannot. (See under ALL and CAN.) In Old English if was often used pleonastically after but in this sense.

But if I have my wille
For derne love of thee, leman, I spille. Chaucer.

3. Excepting or excluding the fact that; save that; were it not that; unless.

And, but infirmity,
Which waits upon worn times, hath something seized
His wish'd ability, he had himself
The lands and waters 'twixt your throne and his Measured to look upon you. Shak.

Last year, my love, it was my hap,
Behind a grenadier to be,
And, but he wore a hairy cap,
No taller man methinks than me. Thackeray.

Often followed by that.

Here we live in an old crumbling mansion that looks for all the world like an inn, but that we never see company. Goldsmith.

4. Only; merely; simply; as, there is but one man present.

If they kill us we shall but die. 2 Ki. vii. 4.

I am, my lord, but as my betters are
That led me hither. Shak.

[A negative has been omitted in such phrases. Chaucer would have said, 'There nis (i.e. is not) but one man present.]—5. Equivalent to a relative with a negative; who, which, &c., . . . not.

No voice exempt; no voice but well could join Melodious part. Milton.

Here 'no voice but well could join' is equivalent to 'no voice which could not well join.' 6. Otherwise than that; that . . . not. In this sense (a) after negative clauses.

I see not then but we should enjoy the same license. B. Jonson.

It cannot be but nature hath some director of infinite power to guide her in all her ways. Hooker.

Believe not but I joy to see thee safe. Rowe.

The negative clause is often represented by the single word not.

Not but they thought me worth a ransom. Hudibras.

Often followed by that.

I was not so young when my father died but that I perfectly remember him. Byron.

Sometimes what follows, but this is considered ungrammatical.

Not but what I hold it our duty never to foster into a passion what we must rather submit to as an awful necessity. Lord Lytton.

(b) In interrogative sentences implying a negative answer.

Who knows but we may make an agreeable and permanent acquaintance with this interesting family? T. Hook.

(c) After such expressions as God forbid.

God defend but still I should stand so. Shak.

7. But and but that are used in a peculiar manner after phrases expressing absence of doubt.

I doubt not but I shall find them. Shak.

There is no question but the King of Spain will reform most of the abuses. Addison.

My lord, I neither can nor will deny
But that I know them. Shak.

[The but in this case may be the adversative conjunction as in 9.]—8. For than.

I no sooner saw my face in it but I was startled at my shortness in it. Addison.

[This usage is not obsolete, but is now considered ungrammatical.]—9. [In the following usages but is clearly an adversative conjunction.] On the contrary; on the other hand; yet; still; however; nevertheless. [In this use but notes an addition to supply what is wanting to elucidate or modify the sense of the preceding part of a sentence or of a discourse, or to continue the discourse, or to exhibit a contrast.]

Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity. 1 Cor. xiii. 13.

When pride cometh, then cometh shame; but with the lowly is wisdom. Prov. xi. 2.

[The adversative force of this conjunction often refers to an unexpressed thought, and not to the clause or sentence preceding.

Of much less value is my company than your good words. But who comes here? Shak.

Have you got nothing for me?—Yes, but I have. Sheridan.]

But often also follows an exclamation of surprise, admiration, terror, or any strong feeling, and introduces a clause expressing the ground of the feeling.

Good heavens, but she is handsome! Adam Smith.

—But and if,† but if.

But and if we have this livery, if we wear his cognizance here in this world, that is, if we love our neighbour, help him in his distress, be charitable, loving and friendly unto him, then we shall be known at the last day. Latimer.

(b) To get rid of the opposition of by paying; to purchase the non-intervention of.

What pitiful things are power, rhetoric, or riches, when they would terrify, dissuade, or buy off conscience. South.

—To buy off counsel is to pay them not to take employment from the opposite party.—To buy out, (a) to buy off; to redeem. 'Dreading the curse that money may buy out.' Shak. (b) To purchase the share or shares of a person in a stock, fund, or partnership, by which the seller is separated from the company, and the purchaser takes his place; as, A buys out B.—To buy over, to detach by a bribe or consideration of some sort from one party and attach to the opposite party.—To buy the refusal, to give money for the right of purchasing at a fixed price at a future time.

Buy (bī), v.i. To negotiate or treat about a purchase; to become a purchaser.

I will buy with you and sell with you. Shak.

Buye,† v.t. To aby; to suffer. Chaucer.

Buyer (bī'ėr), n. One who buys; a purchaser.

Buz,† Buzz† (buz), interj. A sibilant sound uttered to enjoin silence.

The actors are come hither, my lord.—Buz, buz! Shak.

Buzz (buz), v.i. [Purely onomatopoetic. Comp. It. buzzicare, to buzz, whisper.] 1. To make a low hissing sound, as bees; to make the sound of z, with an expiration of breath between the tongue and the roof of the mouth or upper teeth. 'A swarm of drones that buzz'd about your head.' Pope.—2. To whisper; to speak with a low hissing voice; to make a low hissing sound. 'These disturbers of our peace buzz in the people's ears.' Shak.

For I will buzz abroad such prophecies
That Edward shall be fearful of his life. Shak.

3. To share equally the last of a bottle of wine, when there is not enough for a full glass to each of the party.

Get some more port, whilst I buzz this bottle here.
Thackeray.

Buzz (buz), n. 1. A continuous humming sound, as of bees. 'The constant buzz of a fly.' Macaulay.—2. A low whispering hum passing through a crowd; a report circulated secretly and cautiously; a general confused conversation.

There is a certain buzz
Of a stolen marriage. Massinger.
There is a buzz all around regarding the sermon.
Thackeray.

Buzzard (buz'ėrd), n. [Fr. buzard, busard, from buse, a buzzard, and term. -ard, buse being from L.L. busio, for L. buteo, a buzzard.] 1. A genus (Buteo) of large raptorial birds, of the falcon family, marked by a short curved bill, hooked at the tip, long wings, long tarsi, and short weak toes. The common buzzard (B. vulgaris) is 20 inches long, and 4 feet from tip to tip of outstretched wings. It occurs in western Europe and America, and feeds on moles, mice, rats, frogs, &c. It is sluggish in habits, sitting for long periods on a tree watching its prey. The rough-legged buzzard is the B. lagopus. The term is applied to members of other sections of the Falconidæ; thus the moor-buzzard is the Circus æruginosus; the bald-buzzard is the Pandion haliaëtus, or osprey; and the honey-buzzard is the Pernis apivorus. All these species are British.—2. A blockhead; a dunce. Goldsmith.

Near, in motion; as, to move, go, or pass by a church.—3. Through or with, denoting the author, producer, or agent, means, instrument, or cause; as, Waverley, a novel by Sir Walter Scott; a statue by Thorwaldsen; the city was destroyed by fire; profit is made by commerce; to take by force.—4. In an oath or adjuration it indicates the being or thing appealed to as sanction; as, I appeal to you by all that is sacred.

Swear not at all: neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool.
Mat. v. 34, 35.

5. According to; by direction, authority, or example of; as, this appears by his own account; it is ten o'clock by my watch; these are good rules to live by; that is a good model to live by.—6. In the measure or quantity of; at the rate of; in the ratio or proportion of; as, to sell cloth by the yard, milk by the quart, eggs by the dozen, beef by the pound; to board by the week.—7. In comparison it denotes the measure of excess or inferiority; when anything is made larger or smaller it indicates the measure of increase or diminution; as, larger by a half; older by five years; to lessen by a third.—8. During the course of; within the compass or period of; as, by day, by night. 9. Between now, or a specified preceding time, and a later specified time; not later than; as, by this time the sun had risen; he will be here by two o'clock.—10. To; towards; with reference to. 'Do as you would be done by.' Proverb.

In his behaviour to me, he hath dealt hardly by a relation. Fielding.

11.† Against.

Thou hast spoken evil words by the Queen. Foxe.

For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.
1 Cor. iv. 4.

12. Beyond; besides; over and above. [Scotch.]

This ship was of so great stature, and took so much timber, that, except Falkland, she wasted all the woods in Fife, which was oak-wood, by all timber that was gotten out of Norroway. Pitscottie.

—By and by,(a)† at once; immediately; then.

When persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by (Gr. euthys, immediately) he is offended.
Mat. xiii. 21.

(b) Pretty soon; before long; presently.

In the temple, by and by with us
These couples shall eternally be knit. Shak.

—By one's self, without any one else near; solitary; alone.—Two by two, day by day, piece by piece, each two, each day, each piece, taken by itself separately or singly.—Five feet by four, measuring five feet one way and four the other.—By north, south, east, west (naut.), next in the direction stated: phrases used in designating the points of the compass; as, north-east by north. See COMPASS.—By the head (naut.), the state of a vessel so loaded as to draw more forward than aft: opposite to by the stern.

By, with, through: Nearness, oneness, thoroughness, are the ideas these words express, and they are sometimes interchangeable; when by and with express two causes, the first cause or agent is expressed by the use of by, and the second or instrumental cause by with. By belongs to the agent, with to the instrument. This is modern usage. When they both express means only, and not original agency, by implies that the means are necessary, with, that they are auxiliary only. Hence the phrase, 'By our swords we gained these lands, and with our swords we will keep them.' Generally, with indicates companionship, by, the mode or way of performing some act. They are sometimes either appropriate, 'by patience'—'with patience,' though the sense is not exactly the same. Through implies that the means used form the appointed channel for the conveyance of the object named. Angus.

By (bī), a. Side; secondary: used only in composition; as, by-path; by-play; by-street, &c.

By (bī), adv. 1. Near; in the same place with; at hand. 'Unto a neighbouring castle by.' Hudibras.

By-view (bī'vū), n. Private view; self-interested purpose.

No by-views of his own shall mislead him. Atterbury.

By-walk (bī'wąk), n. A secluded or private walk. Dryden.

By-way (bī'wā), n. A secluded, private, or obscure way; an out-of-the-way path; as, highways and by-ways. 'A vast and tangled maze the by-ways of which our plan does not allow us to enter.' Whewell.

By-west (bī'west), prep. Westward from; to the west of. [Old or provincial.]

Whereupon grew that by-word used by the Irish, that they dwelt by-west the law which dwelt beyond the river of the Barrow. Sir J. Davies.

By-wipe (bī'wīp), n. A secret stroke or sarcasm. 'Wherefore that conceit of Legion with a by-wipe.' Milton.

Byword (bī'wėrd), n. [By and word; A. Sax. bigword, a proverb (big = by).] A common saying; a proverb; a saying that has a general currency. 'A wise man that had it for a byword.' Bacon.

I agree with him fully in the last, and if I were forced to allow the first, I should still think, with our old coarse byword, that the same power which furnished all their restorateurs sent also their present cooks. Burke.

[See also extract under BY-WEST.]—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM.

Byzant, Byzantine (biz'ant, biz-an'tīn), n. Same as Bezant (which see).

Byzantine, Byzantian (biz-an'tīn, biz-an'shi-an), a. Pertaining to Byzantium, an ancient city of Thrace, situated on the Bosporus. In the year 330 Constantine the Great fixed the seat of government of the Roman Empire at Byzantium, enlarged and embellished it, and changed its name to Constantinople.—Byzantine architecture, a style of architecture developed in the Byzantine Empire about A.D. 300, and which, under various modifications, continued in use till the final conquest of that empire by the Turks in A.D. 1453. It spread so widely, and was so thoroughly identified with all middle-age art that its influence even in Italy did not wholly decline before the fifteenth century. Its ruling principle is incrustation, the incrustation of brick with more precious materials; large spaces are left void of bold architectural features, to be rendered interesting merely by surface ornament or sculpture. It depended much on colour for its effect, and with this intent mosaics wrought on grounds of gold or of positive colour are profusely introduced. The leading forms which pervade the Byzantine are the round arch, the circle, the cross, and the dome, the last being of eastern origin, while its other features are founded on ancient Roman architecture. The capitals of the pillars are of endless variety, and full of invention; while some are founded on the Greek-Corinthian, many approach in character to those of the Norman; and so varied are their decorations that frequently no two sides of the same capital are alike. Both the Norman and the Lombardic styles may be considered as varieties of the Byzantine, and all of these are comprised under the term Romanesque, which comprehends the round-arch style of middle-age art, as distinguished from the Saracenic and the Gothic, which are pointed-arch species. The mosque of St. Sophia, Constantinople, and the church of St. Mark's, Venice, are prominent examples of Byzantine architecture.—Byzantine historians, a series of Greek historians who lived in the Eastern Empire between the sixth and fifteenth centuries.

C.

C, the third letter in the English alphabet and the second of the consonants. In English it serves to represent two perfectly distinct sounds, namely, the guttural sound pertaining to k and the hard or thin sound of s, the former being that which historically belongs to it; while it also forms with h the digraph ch. The former sound it has before the vowels a, o, and u, the consonants l, r, s, t, and when final; the latter before e, i, and y. The digraph ch has three different sounds, the first nearly equivalent to tsh, as in church; the second in words from the French, equivalent to sh, as in chaise; and the third in words from the Greek, equivalent to k, as in chord. To these the Scotch adds a fourth, heard in the word loch, where the sound of ch is the same as in German. As an initial sound c occurs either alone or before the consonants l and r; as a final it is found chiefly or only in words of foreign origin, in purely English words being followed by k when in this position. (See K.) In the Latin alphabet c had the k sound, and this was the sound which belonged to the letter in Anglo-Saxon in all positions, cicen, a chicken, being pronounced kiken, and cild, a child, kild. The old sound is still retained in many words, but is now often represented by k or ck; in many other words it has been softened, and is now represented by ch, this digraph being borrowed from the French. Thus cicen, cin, cese, ceaf, hwilc, are now chicken, chin, cheese, chaff, which. In ajar, knowledge, the k-sound first changed to the ch-sound, and latterly to the sound of j.—As a numeral, C stands for 100; CC for 200; &c.

C. In music, (a) after the clef, the mark of common time, in which each measure is a semibreve or four minims, corresponding to $\frac{2}{2}$ or $\frac{4}{4}$; and when a bar is perpendicularly drawn through it alla-breve time or a quicker movement is indicated. (b) The name of the first or key note of the modern normal scale, answering to the do of the Italians and the ut of the French. (See SCALE.) This letter is likewise used as the abbreviation of counter-tenor or contralto.

Ca' (kạ), v.t. [Scotch.] 1. To call.—2. To drive; to impel; to push; to knock; as, to ca' a man ower, that is, drive or knock him over. [In this sense the word can scarcely be the same as in the other; comp. Icel. ká, to harass.]

> But ca' them out to park or hill,
> And let them wander at their will. Burns.

Caa (kä), n. An Indian name for the Paraguay tea-plant, which is a species of holly. See MATÉ.

Caaba (kä'a-bä), n. [Ar., from ka'b, a cube.] An oblong stone building within the great mosque at Mecca, regarded with adoration by Mohammedans as having been a place of worship from time immemorial, and as containing the famous black stone or Keblah presented by the angel Gabriel to Abraham on the occasion of building the original Caaba. The entire temple is sometimes called by this name.

Caaing-whale (kạ'ing-whāl), n. [A Scotch name, from the verb to ca', that is, to drive, because these whales can be driven like cattle.] The round-headed porpoise (Globicephalus deductor, Delphinus melas, or D. globiceps), a cetaceous animal of the family Delphinidæ, characterized by a rounded muzzle and a convex head. Its general form resembles that of the porpoise, but it is much larger, attaining a size of 16 to 24 feet, and its general colour is black. It frequents the shores of Orkney, Shetland, the Faroe Islands, and Iceland, appearing in herds of from 200 to 1000, and numbers are often caught. They live on cod, ling, and other large fish, and also on molluscs, especially the cuttle-fishes.

Caama, n. Same as Kaama.

Caas,† n. A case; a quiver. Chaucer.

Cab (kab), n. [Heb. and Chal. kab, a hollow, from kabab, to hollow out.] A Hebrew dry measure, containing according to one estimate 2 pints, according to another 4.

Cab (kab), n. [Abbrev. of cabriolet.] 1. A kind of hackney carriage with two or four wheels, drawn by one horse; a cabriolet. 'A cab came clattering up.' Thackeray.

> With great difficulty Messrs. Bradshaw & Rotch (the latter a member of Parliament) obtained licenses for eight cabriolets in 1823, and started them at fares one-third lower than those of hackney-coaches. The new vehicles were hooded chaises, drawn by one horse, and carrying only one passenger besides the driver, who sat in the cabriolet (or, as more commonly called for brevity, the cab) with his fare. . . . The name 'cab' is still commonly applied to all hackney carriages drawn by one horse, whether on two or four wheels. Penny Cyc.

2. The covered part in front of a locomotive, which protects the driver and stoker and shields the levers, &c.

Cab (kab), v.t. To pass over in a cab; as, to cab the distance: often with an indefinite it; as, I'll cab it to Whitehall. [Colloq.]

Cabacalli (kab-a-kal'lē), n. The native name of the green-heart (which see).

Cabal (ka-bal'), n. [Fr. cabale, the cabala, an intrigue, a cabal. See CABALA.] 1.† The cabala (which see).—2.† A secret. 'The measuring of the temple, a cabal found out but lately.' Ben Jonson. [Rare.]—3. Intrigue; secret artifices of a few persons united in some design. 'Curs'd cabals of women.' Dryden.

> Centuries glide away in the same unvaried round of cabals at court. Brougham.

4. A number of persons united in some close design, usually to promote their private views in church or state by intrigue; a junto. The name of 'the cabal' was given to a ministry of Charles II., consisting of Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names happened to compose the word.

> These ministers were therefore emphatically called the cabal; and . . . it has never since their time been used except as a term of reproach. Macaulay.

—Party, Faction, Cabal, Junto, Combination. Party, a number of influential persons in a state united for the furtherance of some common object or principle, and necessarily involving the idea of an opposition; faction, a smaller number of persons than a party, whose principles and objects are mostly of a captious and frivolous nature, but so persistently advocated as to become annoying; cabal, junto, a union less comprehensive than either party or faction, whose intrigues are conducted in secret and mainly for the aggrandizement of the members of the union; combination, a union of persons in a state or society for self-defence, or the defence of property or principles.

Cabal (ka-bal'), v.i. pret. & pp. caballed; ppr. caballing. To form a cabal; to intrigue; to unite in secret artifices to effect some design. 'Caballing still against it with the great.' Dryden. 'Perpetually caballing against each other.' Macaulay.

Cabala, Cabbala (kab'a-la), n. [Heb. qabbālā, reception, the cabala or mysterious doctrine received traditionally, from qābal, to take or receive.] 1. Tradition, or a mysterious kind of science among Jewish rabbins, pretended to have been delivered to the ancient Jews by revelation—specifically to Moses on Sinai—and transmitted by oral tradition, serving for the interpretation of difficult passages of Scripture. This science consists chiefly in understanding the combination of certain letters, words, and numbers, which are alleged to be significant. Every letter, word, number, and accent of the law is supposed to contain a mystery, and the cabalists pretend even to foretell future events by the study of this science.—2. Any secret science; mystery. 'If I wholly mistake not the cabala of this sect.' Bentley.

Cabalism (kab'al-izm), n. The secret science of the cabalists. 'Allegories, parables, cabalisms.' Dr. Spencer. [Rare.]

Cabalist (kab'al-ist), n. A Jewish doctor who professes the study of the cabala, or the mysteries of Jewish traditions. 'Studious cabalists.' Swift.

Cabalistic, Cabalistical (kab-al-ist'ik, kab-al-ist'ik-al), a. Pertaining to the cabala or mysterious science of Jewish traditions; containing an occult meaning. 'The letters are cabalistical.' Addison.

Cabalistic (kab-al-ist'ik), n. One of the mysteries of the cabala. L. Addison.

Cabalistically (kab-al-ist'ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of the cabalists.

Cabalize (kab'al-īz), v.i. To use the manner or language of the cabalists. [Rare.]

Caballaria (kab-al-lā'ri-a), n. [L. caballus, a nag, a jade.] A feudal tenure of lands, the tenant furnishing a horseman suitably equipped in time of war, or when the lord had occasion for his service.

Caballer (ka-bal'lėr), n. One who unites with others in close designs to effect an object by intrigue; one who cabals. 'A close caballer and tongue-valiant lord.' Dryden.

Caballeria, Cavalleria (ka-val-yā-rē'a), n. [Sp. caballeria, a saddle or cavalry horse, probably because each such measure of land must provide a mounted horseman.] A Spanish superficial measure, equal to about 32 English acres.

Caballero (ka-val-yā'rō), n. A grave and stately Spanish dance.

Caballine (kab'al-līn), a. [L. caballinus, from caballus, a horse.] Pertaining to or suited for a horse; as, caballine aloes.—Caballine spring, the fountain Hippocrene. F. Beaumont.

Caballine (kab'al-līn), n. A coarse kind of aloes used as a medicine for horses.

Caballing (ka-bal'ing), p. and a. Uniting into a cabal; forming cabals; intriguing. 'Caballing captains.' Dryden.

Cabaret (kab'a-ret), n. [Fr.] A tavern; a house where liquors are retailed. 'Some cabaret or tennis-court.' Bramhall.

Cabaretier (ka-bär-tyā), n. [Fr.] The keeper of a cabaret; an alehouse or tavern keeper in France.

Cabas (ka-bä), n. [Fr., from Pg. cabaz, from Ar. gafas, a cage, a pannier.] 1. A kind of pannier of rush or palm-leaves or grass, generally of a round form, serving to carry provisions, especially figs of Provence, prunes and raisins.—2. A lady's flat work-basket or reticule. Sometimes written Caba. Charlotte Brontë.

Cabassou (ka-bas'sō), n. [Native name.] A large species of armadillo, a native of South America (Dasypus unicinctus).

Cabbage (kab'āj), n. [O.E. cabbish, cabage, from Fr. cabus, O.Fr. choux cabus, a large-headed cabbage, O.Fr. cabus, cabuce, large-headed, from L. caput, a head.] 1. The popular name of some species of Brassica, nat. order Cruciferæ, and especially applied to the plane-leaved, hearting, garden varieties of B. oleracea, cultivated for food. The kinds most cultivated are the common cabbage, the savoy, the broccoli, and the cauliflower. The common cabbage forms its leaves into heads or bolls, the inner leaves being blanched. Its varieties are the white, the red or purple, the tree or cow cabbage for cattle (branching and growing when in flower to the height of 10 feet), and the very delicate Portugal cabbage.—Dog's cabbage. See DOG'S-CABBAGE.—Sea-cabbage, Crambe maritima. See CRAMBE.—Cabbage order, a name sometimes given to the Cruciferæ.—2.† The part of a deer's head wherein the horns are set.

Cabbage (kab'āj), v.i. 1. To form a head like that of a cabbage in growing; as, a plant cabbages.—2.† To grow to a head, applied to the horns of a deer. Skelton.

Cabbage (kab'āj), v.t. pret. & pp. cabbaged; ppr. cabbaging. [Fr. cabasser, to put in a cabas or basket; hence, to hoard, steal.] To purloin, especially to purloin pieces of cloth after cutting out a garment.

> Your tailor, instead of shreds, cabbages whole yards of stuff. Arbuthnot.

Cabbage (kab'āj), n. [See the verb.] A cant name for anything filched, more particularly, cloth purloined by one who cuts out garments.

Cabbage-bark (kab'āj-bärk), n. Worm bark; the bark of the Andira inermis, a leguminous tree of the West Indies, formerly used as an anthelmintic. See ANDIRA.

Cabbage-butterfly (kab'āj-but'ėr-fī), n. Pontia or Pieris Brassicæ, a large white butterfly, the larvæ of which destroy cruciferous plants, especially of the cabbage tribe.

Cabbage-daisy (kab'āj-dā-zi), n. The globe-flower (which see).

Cabbage-fly (kab'āj-flī), n. The Anthomyia Brassicæ, a fly belonging to the same family (Muscidæ) as the house-fly, and the same genus as the turnip and potato flies. Its larvæ or maggots are destructive to cabbages by producing disease in the roots on which they feed.

Cabbage-lettuce (kab'āj-let-is), n. A variety of garden lettuce, with leaves forming a low, broad, rounded head like a cabbage. See LACTUCA.

Cabbage-moth (kab'āj-moth), n. The Mamestra or Noctua Brassicæ, or pot-herb moth, a moth measuring about 1⅝ inch across the open fore-wings, which are dusky brown, clouded with darker shades, and marked with pairs of dark spots in their front edge. There are also various streaks and spots of a yellowish or white colour. The caterpillar is greenish-black, and is found in autumn feeding on the hearts of cabbages. It changes to a green pupa.

Cabbage-net (kab'āj-net), n. A small net to boil cabbage in.

Cabbage-palm (kab'āj-päm), n. The cabbage-tree (which see).

Cabbage-rose (kab'āj-rōz), n. A species of rose (Rosa centifolia) of many varieties, supposed to have been cultivated from ancient times and eminently fitted for the manufacture of rose-water and attar from its fragrance. It has a large, rounded, and compact flower. Called also Provence Rose.

Cabbage-palm (Areca oleracea).

Cabbage-tree (kab'āj-trē), n. 1. The cabbage-palm (Areca oleracea), a native of the West Indies. The simple unbranched stem of this palm grows to a height of 150 or even 200 feet. It is crowned by a head of large pinnated leaves. The flowers are placed on a branching spadix and protected by a double spathe. The unopened bud of young leaves is much prized as a vegetable, but the removal of it completely destroys the tree, as it is unable to produce lateral buds. The fibres of the leaves are used for making cordage and nets.—2. A name given in the West Indies to the Andira inermis. See ANDIRA.

Cabbage-wood (kab'bāj-wụd), n. A name given to the wood of the tree Eriodendron anfractuosum.

Cabbage-worm (kab'bāj-wėrm), n. A larva of a species of moths or butterflies infesting cabbages. See CABBAGE-BUTTERFLY.

Cabbala, Cabbalism, Cabbalist, &c., n. See CABALA, CABALISM, CABALIST, &c.

Cabble (kab'l), v.t. or i. pret. & pp. cabbled; ppr. cabbling. In metal. to break flat masses of partially finished iron into pieces, to be again heated in a furnace and wrought or hammered into bar-iron.

Cabbler (kab'lėr), n. In metal. one who cabbles.

Cabby (kab'bi), n. The colloquial or slang name for a cab-driver.

Cabeça (ka-bā'sa), n. [Pg., lit. a head.] 1. The Portuguese name of the finest kind of silk received from India, as distinguished from the bariga, or inferior kind.—2. A nominal money of account on some parts of the west coast of Africa. Four large or eight small cabeças make an ounce, an imaginary coin equal to 12,000 cowries.

Cabeer (ka-bēr'), n. A coin current at Mocha, of the value of 2*s.* 6*d.* sterling.

Cabeiri, n. pl. See CABIRI.

Cabeirian, Cabeiric (ka-bī'ri-an, ka-bī'rik), a. See CABIRIAN.

Cabeiritic (ka-bī-rit'ik), a. See CABIRITIC.

Caber (kā'bėr), n. [Gael. cabar, a pole, a stake, a rafter.] A pole; a beam; specifically, in Highland games, a long undressed stem of a tree; used for tossing or turning over. It is a very severe trial of strength. See KEBAR.

Cabesse (ka-bes), n. [Fr.] Same as Cabeça, 1.

Cabin (kab'in), n. [O.E. caban, cabane, from W. caban, a cabin, dim. of cab, a kind of hut; Ir. and Gael. cabán, a cabin.] 1. A small room; an inclosed place.

> Long in secret cabin there he held
> Her captive to his sensual desire. Spenser.

2. A cottage; a hut or small house or habitation, especially one that is poorly constructed.

> Some of green boughs their slender cabins frame. Fairfax.
> By the peat fires of a hundred thousand cabins had nightly been sung rude ballads which predicted the deliverance of the oppressed race. Macaulay.

3. An apartment in a ship for officers or passengers.

Cabin (kab'in), v.i. To live in a cabin; to lodge. 'Suck the goat and cabin in a cave.' Shak.

Cabin (kab'in), v.t. To confine in a cabin.

> Now I'm cabined, cribbed, confined. Shak.

Cabin-boy (kab'in-boi), n. A boy whose duty is to wait on the officers and passengers on board of a ship.

Cabined (kab'ind), a. Belonging to a cabin.

> Ere the blabbing eastern scout,
> The nice morn, on the Indian steep,
> From her cabin'd loophole peep. Milton.

Cabinet (kab'in-et), n. [Fr. cabinet, a closet, receptacle of curiosities, &c., a dim. form, ultimately from the Celtic. See CABIN.] 1. † A hut; a cottage; a small house.

> Hearken awhile from thy green cabinet,
> The rural song of careful Colinet. Spenser.

2. A closet; a small room or retired apartment.—3. A private room in which consultations are held.

> You began in the cabinet what you afterwards practised in the camp. Dryden.

4. The select or secret counsel of a prince or executive government; the collective body of ministers who direct the government of a nation or country; a goverment council: so called from the apartment in which the meetings were originally held. In Great Britain, though the executive government is vested nominally in the crown, it is practically in a committee of ministers called the cabinet. Every cabinet includes the first lord of the treasury, who is chief of the ministry, and therefore of the cabinet; the lord-chancellor, the lord-president of the council, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the five secretaries of state. A number of other ministerial functionaries, varying from two to eight, have usually seats in the cabinet. Although the cabinet is regarded as an essential part of the institutions of Great Britain, it has never been recognized by act of Parliament.—5. A piece of furniture, consisting of a chest or box, with drawers and doors. 'A cedarn cabinet.' Tennyson.—6. Any part of a building, or one or more whole buildings, set apart for the conservation of works of art, antiquities, &c.; and hence, by metonymy, the collection itself.—Cabinet picture, a picture of a small and generally a highly finished character, suitable to a small room, and for close inspection.

Cabinet (kab'in-et), v.t. To inclose, as in a cabinet. [Rare.]

> 'Tis the frame of most men's spirits to adore the casket and contemn the jewel cabinetted in it. Heywt.

Cabinet-council (kab'in-et-koun-sil), n. 1. A council held with privacy; the confidential council of a prince or executive magistrate; a council of cabinet ministers held with privacy to deliberate upon public affairs.—2. The members of a privy-council; a select number of confidential counsellors. See CABINET, 4.

Cabinet-maker (kab'in-et-māk-ėr), n. A man whose occupation is to make household furniture, such as cabinets, side-boards, tables, bedsteads, &c.

Cabinet-making (kab'in-et-māk-ing), n. The trade or occupation of a cabinet-maker.

Cabin-mate (kab'in-māt), n. One who occupies the same cabin with another. Beau. & Fl.

Cabirean (kab-i-rē'an), n. One of the Cabiri.

Cabiri, Cabeiri (ka-bī'rī), n. pl. [Gr. Kabeiroi.] Divinities worshipped in the ancient Greek islands of Lemnos, Imbros, and Samothrace, and also on the neighbouring coast of Troy in Asia Minor. Very little is known regarding them. They were worshipped with particular honours in the island of Samothrace, where mysteries were celebrated in connection with their worship. Herodotus found certain religious observances practised at Memphis in Egypt which he identifies with the worship paid to the Cabiri, and there are traces of a similar worship in Phœnicia also.

Cabirian, Cabiric (ka-bir'i-an, ka-bir'ik), a. Pertaining to the Cabiri or their worship.

Cabiritic (ka-bi-rit'ik), a. Same as Cabirian.

Cable (kā'bl), n. [Fr. câble, a rope, from L.L. capulum, caplum, a rope, a halter, from L. capio, to take.] 1. A large strong rope or chain, such as is used to retain a vessel at anchor. It is made usually of hemp, jute, or iron, but may be made of other materials. A hemp cable is composed of three strands, each strand of three ropes, and each rope of three twists. A ship's cable is usually 120 fathoms or 720 feet in length; hence the expression a cable's length. Chain-cables have now almost superseded rope-cables. Although deficient in elasticity, heavier, and more difficult of management, yet their immunity from chafing and rotting, their greater compactness for stowage, and the fact that from their greater weight the strain is exerted on the cable rather than on the ship, more than counterbalance these drawbacks.—Stream cable, a hawser or rope, smaller than the bower cables, used for warping a vessel, or to moor her by means of the stream anchor in a river or haven.—Submarine or electric telegraph cable, a cable composed of a single wire of pure copper, or of several wires, embedded in a compound of gutta-percha and resinous substances, so as to be compacted into one solid strand, encircled by layers of gutta-percha or india-rubber, hemp or jute padding, and coils of iron wire, by which telegraphic messages are conveyed through the ocean. (See TELEGRAPH.) The copper wire, or embedded strand of wires, is called the core. This is insulated by being surrounded by several layers of gutta-percha or india-rubber, each layer separated from the other by a coating of resinous matter, and the whole is protected by several iron wires (sometimes galvanized) bound round it in the form of a spiral. The insulating layers are generally separated from the outer wires by a padding of jute or hemp saturated with tar or other protective substance. One wire is found to be better than a strand as regards conducting power; but the latter is safer, as if one wire should break messages could be conveyed through those which remain entire.—Cable bends (naut.), (a) small ropes for fastening the ends of a rope-cable so as to secure the knot by which it is attached to the anchor-ring. (b) See BEND, 2 (b).—2. In arch. (a) a moulding of the torus kind, with its surface cut in imitation of the twisting of a rope. (b) A cylindrical moulding inserted in the flute of a column and partly filling it.

Cable (kā'bl), v.t. pret. & pp. cabled; ppr. cabling. 1. To fasten with a cable.

> Cast out the cabled stone upon the strand. John Dyer.

2. In arch. to fill the flutes of columns with cables or cylindrical pieces.—3. To send a message by an oceanic telegraph cable; as, to cable a message across the Atlantic. Compare to wire in the same use.

Cabled (kā'bld), a. 1. Fastened or supplied with a cable or cables.—2. In her. a term applied to a cross formed of the two ends of a ship's cable.—3. In arch. having the ornament called a cable.

Cablegram (kā'bl-gram), n. [Formed somewhat on type of telegram.] A message sent by an oceanic telegraph cable.

> This cablegram is a fair specimen of the kinds that are daily passing. Argosy.

Cable-laid (kā'bl-lād), a. 1. Naut. applied to a rope formed of three ropes of three-strand yarn made up into one.—2. Applied also to anything twisted after the manner of a cable; as, a cable-laid gold chain.

Cable-moulding (kā'bl-mōld-ing), n. See CABLE, n. 2.

Cablet (kāb'let), n. A little cable; specifically, any cable-laid rope under 9 inches in circumference.

Cable-tier (kā'bl-tēr), n. Naut. (a) the place where the cables are coiled away. (b) The range of coils or rolls of a cable.

Cabling (kāb'ling), n. In arch. the filling of flutes with cables, or the cables themselves so disposed, whether in flutes or without them.

Cablish (kab'lish), n. [O.Fr. cablis, Norm. cabeletz, caables, trees blown down, from L.L. cadabalum, from L. cado, to fall.] In old forest law, windfall wood; wood overthrown by tempestuous weather: applied also sometimes to brushwood.

Cabman (kab'man), n. The driver of a cab.

Cabob (ka-bob'), n. [Per. kabaub, kibaub, roast meat, from kab, an ox.] An oriental dish, consisting generally of a neck or loin of mutton cut in pieces and roasted on a wooden spit, dressed with onions, eggs, spices, and sauce. In India the term is applied to a hot-spiced dish of fish, flesh, or fowl.

Cabob (ka-bob'), v.t. To make cabob of; to roast, as a leg of mutton, with savoury herbs, spices, &c., at a quick fire. Sir T. Herbert.

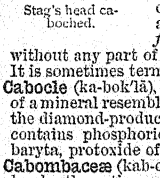
Caboceer (kab-o-sēr'), n. [Probably from Pg. cabeça, a head, a chief.] The name given to local governors in Western Africa appointed by the king over towns or districts.



Stag's head caboched.

Caboched, Cabossed (ka-bosht', ka-bost'), a. [O.Fr. caboche, a head, from L. caput. See CABBAGE.] In her. a term used to express the head of a buck or any other animal that is placed full-faced or affronté, without any part of the neck being visible. It is sometimes termed Trunked.

Cabocle (ka-bok'lā), n. The Brazilian name of a mineral resembling red jasper, found in the diamond-producing sand of Bahia. It contains phosphoric acid, alumina, lime, baryta, protoxide of iron, and water.

Cabombaceæ (kab-om-bā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Cabomba, the native name of the typical genus in Guiana.] A small nat. order of aquatic plants closely allied to the Nymphæaceæ or water-lilies, found in America, India, and Australia, and popularly called Water-shields. They are nutritious and slightly astringent. There are two genera and only three or four known species.

Cabooleat (ka-bụl'i-at), n. [Hind. kabuliyat, a written agreement, from kabul, consent.] An agreement made between the Indian government and the zemindars or feudatory landholders, for the farming, management, and collection of the revenue.

Caboose (ka-bös'), n. [From D. kabuis, kombuis, a caboose or ship's galley; Dan. kabys, Sw. kabysa, kabyssa, a caboose, L.G. kabuse, kabüse, a little room or hut; probably from same root as cabin. The D. kombuis seems to be from kom, a dish, and buis, a pipe, but it is perhaps a modern form invented to make the word appear self-explanatory.] 1. The cook-room or kitchen of a ship. In smaller vessels it is an inclosed fireplace, hearth, or stove for cooking on the main deck. In ships of war and steamboats the cook-room is called a galley.—2. A box that covers the chimney in a ship. [Called also Camboose in both senses.]

There are more than thirty species, of which some are used in different countries as condiments. C. odora is employed in Arabia to fumigate the chambers of the sick.

Cacao (ka-kā'ō), n. [Fr. Sp. Pg. cacao, from Mexican cacauatl, cacao.] The chocolate-tree (Theobroma Cacao), nat. order Byttneraceæ. The cacao is a small tree 16 to 18 feet high, a native of the West Indies, and much cultivated in the tropics of both hemispheres. Its fruit is contained in pointed, oval, ribbed pods 6 to 10 ins. long, each inclosing 50 to 100 seeds in a white, sweetish pulp. These are very nutritive, containing 50 per cent. of fat, are of an agreeable flavour, and used, both in their fresh state and when dried, as an article of diet. Cocoa and chocolate are prepared from them, the former being a powder obtained by grinding the seeds, and often mixed with other substances when dried and roasted, the latter being this powder mixed with sugar and various flavouring matters, and formed into solid cakes. The seeds when roasted and divested of their husks and crushed are known as cocoa nibs. The seeds yield also an oil called butter of cacao, used in pomatum and for making candles, soap, &c. [The term cocoa is a corruption of cacao, but is more commonly used in commerce; cocoa-nuts, however, are obtained from an entirely different tree.]

Cacao (Theobroma Cacao).

Cacao-nut (ka-kā'ō-nut), n. The fruit of the Theobroma Cacao. See CACAO.

Cacatuinæ (kak'a-tū-ī"nē), n. pl. [Malay kakatūa, a cockatoo.] A sub-family of scansorial birds belonging to the family Psittacidæ, characterized by a strong, short, and much curved beak, and a tuft of feathers on the head which they can raise or depress at pleasure as they are agitated by surprise, fear, or curiosity; the cockatoos. It embraces the genera Cacatua or Plictolophus, or white cockatoos; Calyptorhynchus, or black cockatoos; and Microglossum, cockatoos with very large bills and long cylindrical tongues.

Cadge (kaj), v.i. [Provincial English and Scotch.] 1. To hawk goods, as in a cart or otherwise.—2. To intrude or live on another in a mean way.

Cadger (kaj'ėr), n. [Perhaps from O.Fr. cagier, one who carried about falcons or other birds in a cage for sale.] 1. One who brings butter, eggs, poultry, and the like, to the market from the country; an itinerant huckster.—2. A person who gets his living in a questionable manner. 'The gentleman cadger.' Dickens. [Provincial or low in both senses.]

Cadgy (kaj'i), a. [A provincial word allied to Dan. kaad, wanton.] 1. Lively; frolicsome.—2. Wanton.

Cadi (kad'i or kā'di), n. [Turk. kadi, a judge. See ALCALDE.] A judge in civil affairs among the Turks; usually the judge of a town or village.

Cadilesker (kad-i-les'kėr), n. [Turk. kadi, a judge, and leskar, army.] The chief judge in the Turkish Empire; so called because he had originally jurisdiction over the soldiery, who now, however, can be tried only by their own officers.

Cadillac (ka-dil'lak), n. [Cadillac, a town in Gironde, France.] A sort of pear.

Cadis (kad'is), n. [See CADDIS.] A French term for a coarse woollen serge.

Cadjii Gum (kaj'ē-ī gum), n. See ANACARDIUM.

Cadmean, Cadmian (kad-mē'an, kad'mi-an), a. Relating to Cadmus, a legendary prince of Thebes, in Greece, who is said to have introduced into Greece the sixteen simple letters of the alphabet—α, β, γ, δ, ε, ι, ϰ, λ, μ, ν, ο, π, ϱ, σ, τ, υ, which are therefore called Cadmean letters.—A Cadmean victory, a proverbial phrase for a victory in which the victors suffer as much as the vanquished: probably in allusion to the soldiers who sprung from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus, and having engaged in combat destroyed each other.

Cadmia (kad'mi-a), n. [L. cadmia, Gr. kadmia, kadmeia, calamine.] 1.† A name given by old writers to calamine.—2. An oxide of zinc which collects on the sides of furnaces where zinc happens to be present in an ore and is sublimed. Dana.

Cadmium (kad'mi-um), n. [From the above.] Sym. Cd. At. wt. 112. A metal discovered by M. Stromeyer, in 1817, in carbonate of zinc, at Hanover. Its colour is a fine white, with a shade of bluish gray, resembling that of tin. Its texture is compact, its fracture irregular, and it is susceptible of polish. In all its relations it is very analogous to zinc, and it is almost invariably associated with it. It is ductile and malleable, and when fused crystallizes in octahedrons. It melts below a red heat, and when strongly heated in the air it burns, forming a yellow oxide (Cd_2O). Its scarcity prevents its employment in the arts, but the oxide has been used as a pigment. Cadmium occurs in the form of carbonate, as an ingredient in various kinds of calamine, or carbonate of zinc. It is also found in the form of sulphide, as the rare mineral greenockite, and to the extent of 5 per cent. in some kinds of zinc blende. Like zinc, it forms only one oxide, chloride, sulphuret, &c.

Cadmium-yellow (kad'mi-um-yel-lō), n. A pigment prepared from the sulphide of cadmium. It is of an intense yellow colour, and possesses much body.

Cadrans (kad'ranz), n. [Properly a plural from Fr. cadran, cadrant, lit. a quadrant.] An instrument for measuring the angles in cutting and polishing gems, and keeping the gems at the proper angle during the process. E. H. Knight.

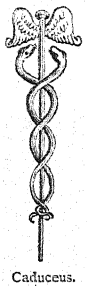
Caducary† (ka-dū'ka-ri), a. [L. caducarius, relating to property without a master.] In old law, relating to escheat, forfeiture, or confiscation.

Caducean (ka-dū'sē-an), a. Belonging to the caduceus or wand of Mercury.

Caduceus (ka-dū'sē-us), n. [L.] In class. myth. Mercury's rod; a wand entwisted by two serpents, borne by Mercury as an ensign of quality and office. On medals the caduceus is a symbol of peace and prosperity; in modern times it is used as a symbol of commerce, Mercury being the god of commerce. The rod represents power; the serpents, wisdom; and the two wings, diligence and activity.



Caduceus.

Caduciary (ka-dū'shi-a-ri), a. [L. caducus, falling.] In Scots law, a term applied to a right not acquired by succession.

Caducibranchiate (ka-dū'si-brang"ki-āt), a. [L. caducus, falling, and branchiæ, gills.] In zool. a term applied to tailed amphibians, such as the newts, which lose the gills before attaining maturity.

Caducibranchiate (ka-dū'si-brang"ki-āt), n. [See above.] A caducibranchiate amphibian.

Caducity (ka-dū'si-ti), n. [Fr. caducité, from L. caducus, from cado, to fall.] A tendency to fall or decay; hence, the period of declining life; senility. 'A heterogeneous jumble of youth and caducity.' Lord Chesterfield. 'At once in a state of childhood and caducity.' Gibbon. [Rare.]

Caducous (ka-dū'kus), a. [See above.] Having a tendency to fall or decay; specifically, in zool. and bot. applied to organs that early drop off, as branchiæ, floral envelopes, &c.

Caduke† (ka-dūk'), a. [See CADUCITY.] Perishing; frail; fleeting. [Rare.]

Cady (kad'i), n. A street porter in Edinburgh. See CADDIE.

Cæcal (sē'kal), a. 1. Of or belonging to the cæcum.—2. Having the form of a cæcum; bag-shaped; as, the cæcal extremity of a duct.

Cæcally (sē'kal-li), adv. In the form or manner of a cæcum.

> In the former (the Articulata), . . . the intestine ends cæcally. Dr. H. A. Nicholson.

Cæcias (sē'si-as), n. [L., Gr. kaikias.] The north-east wind. Milton.

Cæcilia, Cœcilia (sē-sil'i-a), n. [L. cæcus, blind, from the minute size of their eyes.] A genus of amphibians, formerly, on account of their external form, ranked with the ophidian reptiles. They are entirely destitute of limbs, and the eyes are very small, and nearly hidden by the skin. They are usually 1 to 2 feet in length, but often much longer. They constitute an order Ophiomorpha (Owen), of the class Amphibia.

Cæciliadæ, Cæciliæ (sē-sil-i'a-dē, sē-sil'i-ē), n. pl. A name given to the group or order of animals included in the above genus. Also called Cæcilians.

Cæcum (sē'kum), n. pl. Cæca (sē'ka). [L. cæcus, blind.] In compar. anat. a blind process in the alimentary canal of various animals. In fishes they are often numerous and long; and birds have generally two near the termination of the intestine. Mammals have commonly only one cæcum.

Cænozoic (sē-nō-zō'ik), a. See CAINOZOIC.

Caen-stone (kā'en or kon stōn), n. The French equivalent for our Bath oolite. It is a cream-coloured building-stone of excellent quality, got near Caen in Normandy. Although soft in the quarry, it is of fine texture and hardens by exposure, so as to become extremely durable. Winchester and Canterbury Cathedrals, Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster, and many churches are built of it. It is still frequently used in England.

Cæomacei (sē-ō-mā'sē-ī), n. pl. A group of parasitic fungi, including the forms commonly called rust and mildew, which have naked simple spores.

Cærebinæ (sē-rē-bī'nē), n. pl. The guitguits, a sub-family of Australian and South American tenuirostral passerine birds, family Nectarinidæ, of which the Cærebæ Cyana of Cayenne and Guiana may be taken as the type. It is a brilliant bird of the size of a sparrow, its plumage being deeply and gorgeously dyed with azure, verditer, and velvet-black, arranged in a bold and striking manner. Its nest is neatly woven and pensile on the extremity of a slender twig.

Cærule, Cærulean. See CERULE, CERULEAN.

Cæsalpinia (sē-zal-pin'i-a), n. [After Cæsalpinus, physician to Pope Clement VIII.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ. The species are trees or shrubs found in the warmer regions of both hemispheres, with showy yellow or red flowers, bipinnate leaves, and usually more or less prickly stems. The Brazil-wood of commerce is furnished by C. braziliensis, C. crista, and C. echinata; and C. Sappan furnishes the red dye-wood called sappan-wood.

Cæsalpinieæ, Cæsalpineæ (sē-zal-pi-nī'ē-ē, sē-zal-pin'ē-ē), n. pl. A sub-order of leguminous trees, of which Cæsalpinia (which see) is the type.

Cæsar (sē'zėr), n. A title, originally a surname of the Julian family at Rome, which, after being dignified in the person of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, was adopted by successive Roman emperors, and latterly came to be applied to the heir presumptive to the throne. The title was perpetuated in the Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire, a dignity first assumed by Charlemagne. Sometimes in English literature it is nearly equivalent to emperor, conqueror. 'And she shall be sole victress, Cæsar's Cæsar.' Shak. (Rich. III. iv. 4.)

Cæsarean, Cæsarian (sē-zā'rē-an, sē-zā'ri-an), a. Of or pertaining to Cæsar.—Cæsarean section or operation, in midwifery, the operation by which the fetus is taken out of the uterus by an incision through the parietes of the abdomen and uterus, when the obstacles to delivery are so great as to leave no other alternative: said to be so named because Julius Cæsar was brought into the world in this way.

Cæsious (sē'zi-us), a. [L., cæsius, blue.] In bot. lavender-coloured; pale-blue, with a slight mixture of gray.

Cæsium (sē'zi-um), n. [L. cæsius, blue.] Sym. Cs. At. wt. 133. A rare alkaline mineral, first discovered by Bunsen and Kirchoff by spectrum analysis in the saline waters of Durkheim in Germany, and subsequently in other mineral waters. Its spectrum exhibits two characteristic blue lines. The metal occurs in the mineral lepidolite, and has been discovered in greatest abundance in the lepidolite of Hebron, Maine, U.S. It is always found in connection with rubidium. It belongs to the same group of elements with lithium, sodium, potassium, and rubidium, viz. the group of the alkalimetals.

Cæspitose, Cæspitous (ses'pi-tōs, ses'pi-tus), a. See CESPITOSE.

Cæstus (ses'tus), n. See CESTUS.

Cæsura (sē-zū'ra), n. [L. cæsura, a cutting off, a division or stop, from cædere, cæsum, to cut off.] In pros. a pause or division in a verse; a separation, by the ending of a word or by a pause in the sense, of syllables rhythmically connected. Thus in the first of the following lines there is a cæsura or cæsural pause between the fourth and fifth syllables, in the second a cæsura between the fifth and sixth.

> Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
> Spreads undivided, operates unspent.

Cæsural (sē-zū'ral), a. Pertaining to the cæsura.

Caf (kaf), n. The name of the mountain which, according to the Mohammedans, environs the whole earth, which is thus set within it like a finger in a ring.

Café (kaf-ā), n. [Fr., coffee, a coffee-house.] A coffee-house; a restaurant.—Café chantant, a coffee-house in France where the guests are treated with music. Such houses have frequently inclosed yards in front planted with trees, under which the guests sit in summer listening to the singers, &c., who perform on a stage.

Cafenet (kaf'e-net), n. [A corruption, through the influence of Fr. café, of Turk. qahveh-khaneh, contr. qahvench, coffee-house.] In Turkey, a hotel or house of rest for travellers; a coffee-house.

Caff (kaf), n. Chaff. [Scotch.]

Caffa (kaf'a), n. A kind of painted cloth goods manufactured in India.

Caffeic (ka-fē'ik), a. Of or pertaining to coffee.—Caffeic acid, a peculiar vegetable acid ($C_{35}H_{38}O_{17}$) existing in coffee, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen. Called also Caffetannic Acid and Chlorogenic Acid.

Caffeine (ka-fē'in), n. ($C_8H_{10}N_4O_2$.) A slightly bitter, highly azotized substance, crystallizing in slender, silk-like needles, found in coffee-beans, tea-leaves, Paraguay tea, guarana, &c. Coffee contains from 0·8 to 3·6, and tea from 2 to 4 per cent. It is a weak base, and forms salts with an acid reaction. Doses of 2 to 10 grains induce violent nervous and vascular excitement. Called also Theine (which see).

Caffeone (ka-fē'ōn), n. The aromatic principle of coffee. It is a brown oil, heavier than water. An almost imponderable quantity gives an aroma to a quart of water.

Caffer-bread (kaf'ėr-bred), n. The spongy farinaceous pith of the trunk and cones of certain cycadaceous African plants of the genus Encephalartos, used by the Caffres as food. Written also Caffre-bread.

Caffer-corn (kaf'ėr-korn), n. A name given to Indian millet, or Sorghum vulgare, which is cultivated in portions of Africa as a cereal. Written also Caffre-corn. See DURRA, SORGHUM.

Caffetannic (kaf-ē-tan'ik), a. Same as Caffeic (which see).

Caffila, Cafilah (kaf'i-lä), n. [Ar. and Per. kafilet, a caravan, a body of travellers.] An official Persian government caravan; a company of travellers or merchants.

Caffre (kaf'ėr), n. One of a native race of Southern Africa; a Kafir or Kaffir. See KAFIR.

Caftan. Same as Kaftan.

Cag (kag), n. [Dan. and Sw. kagge, a keg.] A small cask or barrel, differing from the barrel only in size, and containing a few gallons, but not of any definite capacity: now always written Keg.

Cage (kāj), n. [Fr. cage, from L. cavea, a hollow, from cavus, hollow (whence E. cave). For changes similar to cage from cavea, see ABRIDGE.] 1. A box, or inclosure made of boards, or with lattice-work of wood, wicker, or wire, for confining birds or beasts. For the confinement of the more strong and ferocious beasts a cage is sometimes made of iron bars.

> It happens with it (wedlock) as with cages; the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair to get out. Florio.

2. Formerly, a prison or place of confinement for petty malefactors.—3. A skeleton framework of any kind; as, (a) in carp. an outer work of timber, inclosing another within it; as, the cage of a windmill, or of a staircase. (b) In mach. a framework to confine a ball-valve within a certain range of motion. (c) A wire guard placed in front of an eduction-opening to allow liquids to pass, but prevent the passage of solids. (d) The framework of a hoisting apparatus, as the framework in which miners ascend and descend the shaft, and by which hutches are raised and lowered. (e) Naut. an iron vessel formed of hoops placed on the top of a pole, and filled with combustibles. It is lighted an hour before high water, and marks an intricate channel navigable for the period it burns.—4. A cup with a glass bottom and cover with a drop of water between containing animalcules to be examined under a microscope.—5. In mining slang, a tap-room, or bar in the store attached to a work.

Cage (kāj), v.t. pret. & pp. caged; ppr. caging. To confine in a cage; to shut up or confine. 'Caged nightingales.' Shak.

Caged (kājd), pp. or a. Resembling a cage or place of confinement. 'The caged cloister.' Shak.

Cageling (kāj'ling), n. A bird kept in a cage; a cage-bird. Tennyson.

Cagmag (kag'mag), n. 1. Tough old geese sent to market; tough dry meat.—2. An inferior kind of sheep. Halliwell. [Vulgar.]

Cagot (kä-gō), n. [Fr., perhaps from Armor. cacouz, leprous. The Cagots are supposed to be descended from lepers.] One of a miserably degraded race of men inhabiting France, in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees, as also, formerly at least, Lower Brittany. In the middle ages they were believed to be cannibals and heretics, and treated with the greatest ignominy. Legally they are now on a level with other Frenchmen, but socially they are still regarded as degraded. From insufficient nourishment and their mode of life they are often deformed and diseased, and have been confounded with Cretins.

Cagui (kag'ụ-ē), n. [Native name.] A name common to two species of monkeys of Brazil, one of them called Hapale Jacchus, and the other H. Œdipus.

Cahier (kä-ē-ā), n. [Fr., O.Fr. cayer, quayer, L.L. quaternum, a sheet of four leaves, L. quatuor, four.] 1. A number of sheets of paper put loosely together; specifically, one of the successive portions of a work, when printed in parts or numbers.—2. Report of proceedings of any body, as the legislature; a memorial.

Cahoot (ka-hōt'), n. [Perhaps from Fr. cohorte, a company.] A company or partnership; as, to go in cahoot with a person. Bartlett. [Southern and Western States of America.]

Caic (ka-ēk'), n. Same as Caique.

Cailliach (kīl'yach), n. [Gael.] An old woman.

> Give something to the Highland cailliochs that shall cry the coronach loudest. Sir W. Scott.

Caimacam (kā-ma-kam'), n. [Turk. kaimacam, lieutenant—kaim, vigilant, and mukaum, a deputy.] A lieutenant or a lieutenant-general in the Turkish service; specifically, a title of the deputy of the grand vizier, and governor of Constantinople. Called also Caimacan.

Caiman, n. See CAYMAN.

Cain-coloured (kān'kul-ėrd), a. A word found only in the following passage:—

> No, forsooth, he has but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard—a cain-coloured beard. Shak. Mer. Wiv. i. 4, 23.

Supposed by some to be for cane-coloured; but Nares explains the word as meaning 'yellow or red as applied to hair; which being esteemed a deformity, was by common consent attributed to Cain and Judas.' Comp. As You Like It, iii. 4, 9. The word cane does not occur in Shakspere.

Ca'ing-whale (kā'ing-whāl), n. Same as Caaing-whale.

Cainite (kān'it), n. [From Cain.] A member of a strange sect of fanatical heretics of the second century, who professed to venerate Cain, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and the Sodomites. They imagined a variety of angels, attributing to each a particular sin, so that when they were about any wickedness they invoked the angel whom they fancied to preside over it. They held that the way to be saved was to gratify their lusts and evil passions, and are said to have asserted that the power which created heaven and earth was an evil one.

Cainozoic (kā-no-zō'ik), a. [Gr. kainos, recent, and zōē, life.] In geol. a term applied to the latest of the three divisions into which strata have been arranged, with reference to the age of the fossils they include. The Cainozoic system embraces the tertiary and post-tertiary systems of British geologists, exhibiting recent forms of life, in contradistinction to the Mesozoic, exhibiting intermediate, and the Palæozoic, ancient and extinct, forms. It corresponds nearly with what has been called the age of mammals. Written also Cænozoic, Kainozoic.

Caique (ka-ēk'), n. [Fr., from Turk. kaik.] 1. A small skiff or rowing boat; especially a light skiff used in the Bosporus, where it almost monopolizes the boat traffic. It may have from one to ten or twelve rowers.—2. A Levantine vessel of larger size.

Ça ira (sä ē-rä). [Fr. 'It (the revolution) shall go on.'] The burden of a French revolutionary song composed about 1789 or 1790.

Caird (kārd), n. [Ir. Gael. ceard, a tinker.] A travelling tinker; a tramp; a vagrant; a gypsy. Sir W. Scott. [Scotch.]

Cairn (kārn), n. [Gael. Ir. W. carn, a heap, a cairn.] A heap of stones; especially one of those large heaps of stones common in Great Britain, particularly in Scotland and Wales, and generally of a conical form. They are of various sizes, and were probably constructed for different objects. Some are evidently sepulchral, containing urns, stone chests, bones, &c. Some were erected to commemorate some great event, others appear to have been intended for religious rites, while the modern cairn is generally set up as a landmark, or to arrest the attention, as in surveying, or in leaving traces of an exploring party or the like. See BARROW.

Cairned (kārnd), a. Surmounted by a cairn or cairns.

> The cairn'd mountain was a shadow. Tennyson.

Cairngorm, Cairngorm-stone (kārn'gorm, kārn'gorm-stōn), n. A yellow or brown variety of rock-crystal or crystallized silica, found in great perfection on the Cairngorm range in Scotland. They are regular hexagonal crystals, with a pyramidal top, and are much used for brooches, seals, and other ornaments. The colour is due to a little oxide of iron or manganese.

Caisson (kās'son), n. [Fr., caisson, from caisse, a chest, a case, from L. capsa, a chest.] 1. Milit. (a) a wooden chest into which several bombs are put, and sometimes gunpowder, to be laid in the way of an enemy or under some work of which the enemy intend to possess themselves, and to be fired when they get possession. (b) An ammunition wagon; also, an ammunition chest.—2. In arch. a sunken panel in a vaulted ceiling or in the soffit of a Corinthian or Composite cornice; a coffer; a lacunar.—3. In civil engin. (a) a vessel in the form of a boat used as a flood-gate in docks. (b) An apparatus on which vessels may be raised and floated; especially a kind of floating-dock, which may be sunk and floated under a vessel's keel, used for docking vessels while at their moorings, without removing stores or masts. See FLOATING-DOCK. (c) A water-tight box or casing used in founding and building structures in water too deep for the coffer-dam, such as piers of bridges, quays, &c. They often take the shape of a cylinder with an open bell-like chamber resting on the ground where the excavating, building, &c., is to take place. Air is supplied to the workman in the same way as is done to the diver in a diving-bell.

Caissoon (kās-sōn'), n. Same as Caisson, more especially in meaning 3.

Caithness Flags (kāth'nes flagz), n. pl. A well-known series of dark, bituminous, durable, slightly micaceous and calcareous flaggy beds of the lower-middle old red system of Scotland. They abound in fossil fishes, and are much used in paving.

Caitiff (kā'tif), n. [O.Fr. caitif, chaitif, captive, unfortunate; Mod. Fr. chétif, pitiful, mean, vile; from L. captivus, a captive, from capere, to take.] 1.† A captive; a prisoner; a slave.

> Avarice doth tyrannize over her caitiff and slave. Holland.

2. A mean villain; a despicable knave; one who is both wicked and mean. 'Striking great blows at caitiffs and at wrongers of the world.' Tennyson.

> Like caitiff vile that for misdeed
> Rides with his face to rump of steed. Hudibras.

Caitiffly† (kā'tif-li), adv. Knavishly; servilely; basely.

Caitiftee,† n. [Through the French, from L. captivitas, captivity. See CAITIFF.] The state of being a captive; captivity.

> He that leadeth into caitiftee, schall go into caitiftee. Wickliffe.

Caitive,† Caytive† (kā'tiv), n. and a. Same as Caitiff. Spenser.

Cajanus, Cajan (ka-jā'nus, kaj'an), n. [Catjan, its Malabar name.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, one species of which, C. indicus, furnish a sort of pulse used in tropical countries. It is a shrub 3 to 10 feet high, and a native of the East Indies, but now extensively cultivated throughout the tropics. Called also Pigeon-pea, Angola-pea, Congo-pea, &c.

Cajeput, Cajuput (kaj'i-put, kaj'ụ-put), n. [Malay kayú, a tree, and putih, white.] An oil from the East Indies resembling that of cardamoms, obtained from the Melaleuca Cajuputi, or cajeput-tree of the Moluccas. It is antispasmodic, stimulant, and sudori-fic, and is said to be a remedy in Asiatic cholera.

Cajole (ka-jōl'), v.t. pret. & pp. cajoled; ppr. cajoling. [Fr. cajoler, to cajole; O.Fr. cageoler, to sing or chatter like a bird in a cage, from cage.] To deceive or delude by flattery, specious promises, simulated compliance with another's wishes, and the like; to wheedle; to coax.

But while the war went on the emperor did cajole the king. Ep. Burnet.

Charles found it necessary to postpone to a more convenient season all thought of executing the treaty of Dover, and to cajole the nation by pretending to return to the policy of the Triple Alliance. Macaulay.

Cajolement (ka-jōl'ment), n. Cajolery. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Cajoler (ka-jōl'ėr), n. One who cajoles; a wheedler.

Cajolery (ka-jōl'ėr-i), n. The act of cajoling; coaxing language or tricks; a wheedling to delude. 'Infamous cajoleries.' Evelyn.

Cajuput. See CAJEPUT.

Cake (kāk), n. [Icel. and Sw. kaka, Dan. kage, D. koeck, G. kuchen, cake; probably from L. coquere, to cook. See COOK.] 1. A mass of fine light dough baked, and generally sweetened or flavoured with various ingredients, or a composition of flour, butter, sugar, or other ingredients, baked in a mass. The name is applied to various compositions baked or cooked in different shapes.—2. Something made or concreted in the form of a cake; a mass of matter in a solid form relatively thin and extended; as, a cake of soap.

Cakes of rustling ice came rolling down the flood. Dryden.

3. Oil-cake for feeding cattle.

How much cake or guano this labour would purchase we cannot even guess at. Anstad.

—One's cake is dough, one has failed; one has had a failure or miscarriage.

My cake is dough, but I'll in among the rest. Shak.

Steward, your cake is dough as well as mine. B. Jonson.

Cake (kāk), v.t. pret. & pp. caked; ppr. caking. To form into a cake or mass.

Cake (kāk), v.i. To concrete or become formed into a hard mass, as dough in an oven, &c. 'Clotted blood that caked within.' Addison.

Cake (kāk), v.i. To cackle. [North of England.]

Cake-bread (kāk'bred), n. Fine white bread; manchet. B. Jonson.

Cake-urchin (kāk'ur-chin), n. A name popularly applied to sea-urchins (Echinoidea) having a discoid shape.

Cakile (kak'i-lē), n. [Arabic name.] A genus of cruciferous plants. The species are smooth, fleshy, annual branched herbs, with entire or pinnatifid leaves, and natives of the sea-coasts of the northern hemisphere. C. maritima (purple sea-rocket) is a native of Britain. (See SEA-ROCKET.) There are two other species, C. americana and C. æqualis, all pretty annuals.

Cal (kal), n. A mining term for a kind of bastard metal found in tin ore; wolfram.

Calaba (kal'a-ba). See CALOPHYLLUM.

Calabar Bean (kal-a-bär' bēn), n. The seed of Physostigma venenosum, a leguminous African plant, nearly allied to the kidney-bean, employed in medicine chiefly as an agent for producing contraction of the pupil. It is a powerful narcotic poison, operating also as a purgative and emetic, and in virtue of these last qualities is the famous 'ordeal bean' of Africa, administered to persons suspected of witchcraft. If it causes purging it indicates crime; if vomiting, innocence. It induces fainting fits and asphyxia, and weakens or paralyzes the action of the heart.

Calabash (kal'a-bash), n. [Pg. calabaça,

Calabashes, from Kew Gardens, and Private Collection

Sp. calabaza, Catalan carabassa, a gourd, a calabash; from Ar. qar, a gourd, and aibas, dry.] 1. A vessel made of a dried gourd-shell or of a calabash shell, used for containing liquors or goods, as pitch, resin, and the like. They are so close-grained and hard that when they contain any liquid they may be put several times on the fire as kettles. They are sometimes highly polished, and have figures engraved on them, which are variously tinged with indigo or other colours.—2. The fruit of the calabash-tree. 3. A popular name of the gourd-plant (Cucurbita).

Calabash-tree (kal'a-bash-trē), n. 1. The popular name of the American trees or shrubs belonging to the genus Crescentia, given to them because of their large gourd-like fruits, the hard shells of which are made into numerous domestic utensils, as basins, cups, spoons, bottles, &c.—2. A name also given to Adansonia digitata, the baobab of Africa. See BAOBAB.

Calaboose (kal-a-bōs'), n. [Sp. calabozo, a dungeon, probably from Ar. qal'ah, castle, and bûs, hidden.] A prison. [United States, local.]

Calabre,† Calaber† (ka-lā'bėr), n. A Calabrian fur. 'His cloke of calabre.' Piers Ploweman. 'Costly grey amices of calaber.' Bale.

Calade (ka-lād' or ka-lād), n. [Fr.] The slope or declivity of a rising manege-ground, down which a horse is ridden in training him.

Caladium (ka-lā'di-um), n. [From kalo, a native name for the edible rhizome.] A genus of plants, nat. order Araceæ, having the upper part of the spadix entirely covered with stamens, and the base with ovaries. The leaves are oblong-cordate, with large lobes, often veined with red. The juice of these plants is very acrid, but its injurious qualities are destroyed by cooking, and the fleshy starch-bearing rhizomes of some species are used as food. They are natives of the West and East Indies, &c., and are often cultivated. They have been introduced into our hot-houses because of their fine foliage.

Calaite (ka-lā'īt), n. [L. callaïs, Gr. kallaïs, a greenish-blue precious stone.] A name given to the turquoise (which see).

Calamagrostis (kal'a-ma-gros''tis), n. [Gr. kalamos, a reed, and agrōstis, the name of several grasses.] A genus of grasses allied to Arundo; small reed. The species are mere weeds, found chiefly in damp woods. Three species are found in Britain.

Calamanco (kal-a-mang'ko), n. [L.L. calamancus, calamaucum, camelaucum, &c., perhaps a stuff originally of camel's hair.] A woollen stuff of a fine gloss and checkered in the warp. 'A gay calamanco waistcoat.' Addison.

Calamander Wood (kal-a-man'dėr wud), n. [Supposed to be a corruption of Coromandel wood.] A beautiful species of wood, the product of Diospyros quæsita, nat. order Ebenaceæ, a native of Ceylon; it resembles rosewood, but is so hard that it is worked with great difficulty. It takes a very high polish, and is wrought into chairs and tables, and yields veneers of almost unequalled beauty.

Calamar (kal'a-mär), n. Same as Calamary.

Calamary (kal'a-ma-ri), n. [Sp. calamar, a calamary, from L. calamus, a reed, pen.] The general name for decapod cuttle-fishes of the family Teuthidæ, order Dibranchiata, but properly used to designate those of the genus Loligo. The body is oblong, soft, fleshy, tapering, and flanked behind by two triangular fins, and contains a pen-shaped gladius or internal horny flexible shell. They have the power of discharging, when alarmed or pursued, a black fluid from an ink-bag. The species are found in all seas, and furnish food to dolphins, whales, &c. Some species can dash out of the water and propel themselves through the air for 80 or 100 yards. Loligo vulgaris occasionally grows to the length of 2½ feet. Called also Squid, Sea-sleeve, Prelte, or Pen-fish.

Calambac (kal'am-bak), n. [Fr. calambac, from Per. kalambak, a fragrant wood.] Same as Agallochum.

Calambour (kal'am-bör), n. [Fr. calambour, calambourc, &c. See CALAMBAC.] A species of the aloes-wood, of a dusky or mottled colour, of a light friable texture, and less fragrant than calambac. This wood is used by cabinet-makers and inlayers.

Calamiferous (kal-a-mif'ėr-us), a. [L. calamus, a reed, and fero, to bear.] Producing reedy plants; reedy.

Calamine, Calamin (kal'a-mīn, kal'a-min), n. [L.L. calamina, from L. cadmia (d being changed into l), calamine, cadmia.] The native siliceous oxide of zinc, an important British ore of zinc, from which the metal is got chiefly by distillation. It generally occurs associated with zinc carbonate in calcareous rocks.

Calamint (kal'a-mint), n. A plant of the genus Calamintha.

Calamintha (kal-a-min'tha), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and mintha, mint.] A genus of plants, nat. order Labiatæ.] The plants are herbs or shrubs with dense whorls of purple-white or yellow flowers, with a two-lipped corolla and four conniving stamens. Five species are British, viz. C. Nepeta, lesser calamint; C. officinalis, common calamint; C. sylvatica, wood-calamint; C. Acinos, basil-thyme; and C. Clinopodium, wild-basil. They all contain a volatile oil.

Calamist† (kal'a-mist), n. [L. calamus, a reed.] A piper; one who plays on a reed or pipe. Blount.

Calamistrate† (kal-a-mis'trāt), v.t. [L. calamistrare, from calamister or calamistrum, an iron tube for curling the hair, from calamus, a reed.] To curl or frizzle, as the hair. Cotgrave; Burton.

Calamistration† (kal'a-mis-trā''shon), n. The act of curling the hair.

Calamistrations, ointments, &c., . . . will make the veriest dowdy otherwise a goddess. Burton.

Calamite (kal'a-mīt), n. [L. calamus, a reed.] 1. A mineral, probably a variety of tremolite. It occurs in imperfect or rounded prismatic crystals, longitudinally striated, and sometimes resembling a reed. Its structure is foliated, its lustre vitreous, and more or less shining.—2. A fossil of the genus Calamites.

Calamites (kal-a-mī'tēz), n. [L. calamus, a reed.] A genus of fossil plants, very characteristic of the carboniferous rocks. They had the habit of the modern equisetums, to which they are closely allied, but they were arborescent, with woody stems, true leaves, and corms with fruit scales like Equisetum, but protected externally with bract leaves.

Calamitous (ka-lam'i-tus), a. [Fr. calamiteux. L. calamitosus. See CALAMITY.] 1.† Suffering calamity; miserable; involved in deep distress; wretched. 'Ten thousands of calamitous persons.' South.—2. Producing or resulting from calamity; making wretched; distressful; as, a calamitous event. 'That calamitous prison.' Milton. 'His sad and calamitous condition.' South. SYN. Miserable, deplorable, distressful, afflictive, wretched, grievous, baleful, disastrous, adverse, unhappy, severe, sad.

Calamitously (ka-lam'i-tus-li), adv. In a calamitous manner; in a manner to produce great distress.

Calamitousness (ka-lam'i-tus-nes), n. The quality of bringing calamity or misery; deep distress; wretchedness; misery.

Calamity (ka-lam'i-ti), n. [L. calamitas, a word of doubtful root.] Any great misfortune or cause of misery; generally applied to events or disasters which produce extensive evils, as loss of crops, earthquakes, conflagrations, defeat of armies, and the like. But it is applied also to the misfortunes which bring great distress upon individuals.

Calamity is man's true touchstone. Beau. & Fl.

The deliberations of calamity are rarely wise. Burke.

—Misfortune, Calamity, Disaster. See under MISFORTUNE.—SYN. Disaster, distress, affliction, adversity, misfortune, unhappiness, infelicity, mishap, mischance, misery, evil, extremity, exigency, downfall.

Calamodendron (kal'a-mō-den''dron), n. [Gr. kalamos, a reed, and dendron, a tree.] In geol. a genus of coal-plants, nat. order Equisetaceæ, often of considerable thickness, with smooth surface or bark, and articulated hollow stems; reed-tree. They are generally represented by the amorphous casts of their striated hollow axes.

Calamus (kal'a-mus), n. [L. calamus, a reed, a reed-pen, a pipe of reed; Gr. kalamos. The root is the same as in E. haulm.] 1. In Scrip. the word used to translate a Hebrew term which is believed to mean an aromatic substance obtained from some kind of reed or cane, probably Andropogon Schœnanthus or A. Calamus aromaticus (sweet-scented lemon-grass).—2. The root of the sweet-flag or sweet-rush (Acorus Calamus). See SWEET-RUSH.—3. A genus of palms, the stems of the different species of which are the rattan-canes of commerce.

This genus holds a middle station between the grasses and palms, with the habit of the former and the inflorescence of the latter. The species are principally found in the hotter parts of the East Indies. The stems of C. Rotang, C. verus, C. rudentum, and C. extensus are extensively used for the bottoms of chairs and similar articles. Malacca canes, so much used for walking-sticks, are the stems of C. scipionum, which are imported from Singapore and Malacca, but are chiefly grown in Sumatra. The resin called dragon's-blood is yielded by C. Draco. 4. In the R. Cath. Ch. a tube of precious metal, anciently used by communicants when partaking of the contents of the chalice in the eucharist. The kings of France used it at their coronation when they partook of both kinds in the sacrament.

Calando (ka-lan'dō). [It., ppr. of calare, to decrease.] In music, a direction to gradually slacken the pace and decrease the volume of tone.

Calandra (ka-lan'dra), n. [It. calandra, Gr. kalandra, a kind of lark.] 1. A species of lark (Alauda calandra), with a thick bill, the upper part of the body of a reddish brown, spotted with black, with a body thicker than the sky-lark. It is a native of Southern Europe and Northern Africa.—2. A genus of coleopterous insects, belonging to the section Rhynchophora, and family Curculionidæ. Some of the minute species commit great havoc in granaries, both in their larva and perfect state. They are very numerous, and among them are the well-known corn-weevil (C. granaria) and the rice-weevil (C. oryzæ). The gru-gru worm, which destroys palm-trees in South America, is the larva of C. palmarum, and is nearly 2 inches long. This grub is eagerly sought for by the natives, who eat it when cooked. This species, with C. sacchari, destroys also the sugar-canes of the West Indies.

Corn-weevil (Calandra granaria), natural size and magnified.

Calangay (ka-lang'gā), n. A species of white parrot.

Calapitte (kal'a-pit), n. [Malayan calappa, the cocoa-tree.] A stony concretion occasionally present in the cocoa-nut, called also Vegetable Bezoar, much worn by the Malays as an amulet of great virtue.

Calash (ka-lash'), n. [Fr. calèche, from G. kalesche, a word of Slavonic origin: Bohem. kolesa, Pol. kolaska.] 1. A light chariot or carriage, with very low wheels. It may be open, or covered with a folding top which can be let down at pleasure. 'When you and I take the air in the calash together.' Locke. 2. The folding hood or top sometimes fitted to such a carriage.—3. A cover for the head sometimes used by ladies. It is generally made of silk supported on a frame of cane or whalebone, and worn projecting well over the face.

> Mrs. Bute's eyes flashed out at her from under her black calash. Thackeray.

Calathidium, Calathium (kal-a-thid'i-um, ka-lā'thi-um), n. [Gr. kalathos, a flower-basket.] Names sometimes given to the flower-head of the plants called Compositæ.

Calathiform (kal'a-thi-form), a. [L. calathus, a basket, a bowl, and forma, form.] In bot. hemispherical or concave, like a bowl or cup.

Calathium. See CALATHIDIUM.

Calathus (kal'a-thus), n. [Gr. kalathos, a basket.] An ancient sort of basket in which Greek and Roman women kept their work. It is often represented on monuments, and frequently as a symbol of maidenhood.

Calcaire-grossier (kal-kār-grō-sē-ā), n. [Fr., lit. coarse limestone.] In geol. the coarse calcareous building-stone of Paris, formed of foraminiferous shells. It forms an extensive stratum, or rather series of strata, in the Paris basin, and belongs to the eocene tertiary period.

Calcaneal (kal-kā'nē-al), a. In anat. relating to the calcaneum, or great bone of the heel; as, calcaneal arteries.

Calcaneum (kal-kā'nē-um), n. [L., the heel.] In anat. the largest bone of the tarsus; the bone that forms the heel.

Calcar (kal'kär), n. [L. calcar, a spur, from calx, calcis, the heel.] In bot. a spur; a hollow projection from the base of a petal. It is the nectary of Linnæus.

Calcar (kal'kär), n. [L. calcaria, a lime-kiln, from calx, lime.] In glass-works, a kind of oven or reverberating furnace, used for the calcination of sand and salt of potash, and converting them into frit.

Calcarate (kal'ka-rāt), a. [L. calcar, a spur.] In bot. furnished with a spur; as, a calcarate corolla, such as that of larkspur.

Calcareo-argillaceous (kal-kā'rē-ō-är-jil-lā'shus), a. Partly calcareous partly argillaceous.

Calcareo-bituminous (kal-kā'rē-ō-bi-tū'min-us), a. Consisting of or containing lime and bitumen.

Calcareo-siliceous (kal-kā'rē-ō-si-li''shus), a. Consisting of or containing lime and silica.

Calcareo-sulphurous (kal-kā'rē-ō-sul'fėr-us), a. Having lime and sulphur in combination, or partaking of both.

Calcareous (kal-kā'rē-us), a. [L. calcarius, calcareous, from calx, lime (whence E. chalk).] Partaking of the nature of lime; having the qualities of lime; containing lime; as, calcareous earth or stone.—Calcareous spar, crystallized carbonate of lime. It is found crystallized in more than 700 different forms, all having for their primitive form an obtuse rhomboid. The rarest and most beautiful crystals are found in Derbyshire.—Calcareous tufa, an alluvial deposit of carbonate of lime, formed generally by springs, which, issuing through limestone strata, hold in solution a portion of calcareous earth; this they deposit on coming in contact with air and light.

Calcareousness (kal-kā'rē-us-nes), n. Quality of being calcareous.

Calcariferous (kal-ka-rif'ėr-us), a. [L. calcarius, from calx, calcis, lime, and fero, to bear.] In geol. and mineral. lime-yielding; as, calcariferous strata. Applied also to petrifying springs charged with carbonate of lime, which, on the spring issuing into the air, is deposited as crusts of calcareous tufa. [Rare.]

Calcavella, Calcavellos (kal-ka-vel'la, kal-ka-vel'los), n. A kind of sweet wine from Portugal. See CARCAVELHOS.

Calceated † (kal'sē-āt-ed), a. [L. calceatus, from calceus, a shoe.] Shod; fitted with or wearing shoes. Johnson.

Calcedon (kal'si-don), n. [See CHALCEDONY.] In jewelry, a foul vein, like chalcedony, in some precious stones.

Calcedonic, Calcedonian (kal-si-don'ik, kal-si-dō'ni-an), a. Chalcedonic (which see).

Calcedony (kal-sed'o-ni), n. Chalcedony (which see).

Calceiform (kal-sē'i-form), a. [L. calceus, a slipper, and forma, form.] Having the form of a slipper, as the corolla of Calceolaria; calceolate.

Calceolaria (kal-sē-ō-lā'ri-a), n. [L. calceolus, a slipper, from the shape of the inflated corolla resembling a shoe or slipper.] Slipperwort, a genus of ornamental herbaceous or shrubby plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. All the species are South American; several have been long known in British gardens. Most of them have yellow flowers, some have puce-coloured ones, and some occur with the two colours intermixed, while some are white. The roots of C. arachnoidea, the parent of many of our hybrids, are used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson, under the name of relbun. The greater number of the calceolarias in cultivation are hybrids and not true species.

Calceolaria.

Calceolate (kal'sē-ō-lāt), a. Same as Calceiform.

Calces, Calxes. See CALX.

Calcic (kal'sik), a. [L. calx, calcis, lime.] Of or pertaining to lime; containing calcium; as, calcic chloride, or chloride of calcium.

Calciferous (kal-sif'ėr-us), a. [L. calx, lime, and fero, to produce.] Producing or containing lime, especially when in considerable quantity; as, calciferous strata; calciferous sandstone.

Calcification (kal'si-fi-kā''shon), n. [L. calx, calcis, lime, and facio, to make.] In chem. a changing into lime; the process of changing into a stony substance by the deposition of salts of lime, as in the formation of teeth.

Calciform (kal'si-form), a. [L. calx, lime, and forma, form.] In the form of chalk or lime.

Calcify (kal'si-fi), v.i. pret. & pp. calcified; ppr. calcifying. [L. calx, lime, and facio, to make.] To become gradually changed into a stony condition by the deposition or secretion of lime, as in the formation of teeth.

Calcify (kal'si-fi), v.t. To make stony by depositing lime.—Calcifying segment, a thick glandular sac or dilatation in the lower part of the oviduct of birds, often, but erroneously, called the uterus, which secretes the shell of the egg.

Calcigenous (kal-sij'en-us), a. [L. calx, calcis, lime, and gigno, genui, to produce.] In chem. a term applied to the common metals, which with oxygen form a calx or earth-like substance.

Calcigerous (kal-sij'ėr-us), a. [L. calx, lime, and gero, to bear.] Producing or containing lime.

Calcimine (kal'si-mīn), n. [L. calx, calcis, lime.] A superior kind of white or coloured wash for the walls of rooms, ceilings, &c.

Calcimine (kal'si-mīn), v.t. To wash or cover with calcimine; as, to calcimine walls.

Calcimurite (kal-si-mū'rīt), n. [L. calx, lime, and muria, salt water.] A species of earth of a blue or olive-green colour, of the consistence of clay. It consists of calcareous earth and magnesia tinged with iron.

Calcinable (kal-sī'na-bl), a. Capable of being calcined or reduced to a friable state by the action of fire.

Calcinate (kal'si-nat), v.t. pret. & pp. calcinated; ppr. calcinating. To calcine. Bacon. [Rare.]

Calcination (kal-si-nā'shon), n. 1. The act or operation of calcining or expelling from a substance by heat some volatile matter with which it is combined, or which is the cementing principle, and thus reducing it to a friable state. Thus chalk and carbonate of lime are reduced to lime by calcination or the expulsion of carbonic acid.—2. † The operation of reducing a metal to an oxide or metallic calx: now called Oxidation. Ure.

Calcinatory (kal-sin'a-to-ri), n. A vessel used in calcination.

Calcine (kal-sīn'), v.t. pret. & pp. calcined; ppr. calcining. [Fr. calciner, from L. calx. See CALX.] 1. To reduce to a powder or to a friable state by the action of heat; to free from some volatile matter combined or forming a cementing principle by the action of heat, as limestone from carbonic acid, iron ore from sulphur, salts from the water of crystallization. — 2. † To oxidize, as a metal; to reduce to a metallic calx.

Calcine (kal-sīn'), v.i. To be converted into a powder or friable substance, or into a calx, by the action of heat.

> This crystal is a pellucid one . . . in a very strong heat calcining without fusion. Newton.

Calciner (kal-sīn'ėr), n. 1. One who calcines.—2. A calcining or roasting furnace.

Calcispongiæ (kal-si-spon'ji-ē), n. pl. [L. calx, calcis, lime, and spongia, Gr. sponggia, a sponge.] A marine order or division of the sponges, the sarcode of which is supported by granular horny matter, mixed with three-rayed needles or spicules of carbonate of lime. These sponges are mostly extinct, but some species are found round the coast of Britain, hanging from the under side of rocks between tide marks.

Calcite (kal'sīt), n. [L. calx, lime.] A term applied to various minerals, all of which are modifications of the rhombohedral form of calcium carbonate. It includes limestone, all the white and most of the coloured marbles, chalk, Iceland-spar, &c.

Calcitrate † (kal'si-trāt), v.t. [L. calcitro, to kick, from calx, the heel.] To kick.

Calcitration † (kal-si-trā'shon), n. The act of kicking.

> The birth of the child is caused partly by its calcitration breaking the membranes in which it lieth. Ross.

Calcium (kal'si-um), n. [From L. calx, lime.] Sym. Ca. At. wt. 40. The metallic basis of lime, and the most widely diffused of the alkaline metals. It was first obtained by Davy in 1808 by the action of voltaic electricity. Calcium is a light yellow metal, about as hard as gold, very ductile and malleable, and burns in chlorine with a most brilliant flame. It is very oxidizable, rapidly changing into the oxide or quicklime in the air. It unites with all the non-metallic elements, and hence its compounds are numerous, long known, and extensively used. The combination of calcium and oxygen forms the well known and highly useful substance lime.

Calcium Light (kal'si-um līt), n. See DRUMMOND LIGHT.

Calcographer (kal-kog'ra-fėr), n. One who practises calcography.

Calcographical (kal-kō-graf'ik-al), a. [See CALCOGRAPHY.] Pertaining to calcography.

Calcography (kal-kog'ra-fi), n. [L. calx, chalk, and Gr. graphō, to engrave.] The art of drawing with black or coloured chalks.

Calc-sinter (kalk'sin-tėr), n. [L. calx, lime, and G. sinter, a stalactite.] A stalactitic carbonate of lime, a variety of calcite, consisting of deposits from springs holding carbonate of lime in solution. Calc-sinter forms the stalactites and stalagmites which beautify many caves, as that of Castleton, Derbyshire, the Grüne Höhle, Westphalia, &c. Unguent boxes were made of it by the ancients.

Calc-spar (kalk'spär), n. Calcareous spar, or crystallized carbonate of lime.

Calc-tuff (kalk'tuf), n. An alluvial formation of carbonate of lime. See CALCAREOUS.

Calculable (kal'kū-la-bl), a. Capable of being calculated or ascertained by calculation. 'The operation of forces visible and calculable.' Ansted.

Calculary (kal'kū-la-ri), n. [L. calculus, a pebble.] A congeries of little stony knots often found in the pulp of the pear and other fruits, formed by concretions of the sap.

Calculary (kal'kū-la-ri), a. In med. relating to calculi; relating to the disease of stone in the bladder.

Calculate (kal'kū-lāt), v.t. pret. & pp. calculated; ppr. calculating. [L. calculo, calculatum, from calculus, a counter or pebble used in calculations, a dim. from calx, a small stone, a counter.] 1. To ascertain by computation; to compute; to reckon up; to estimate; as, to calculate the cost of a house. 2. To make the necessary or usual computations regarding; as, to calculate eclipses or nativities.

A cunning man did calculate my birth,
And told me that by water I should die. Shak.

3. To fit or prepare by the adaptation of means to an end; to make suitable: generally in pp. in this sense. 'Religion is calculated for our benefit.' Tillotson.

This letter was admirably calculated to work on those to whom it was addressed. Macaulay.

Calculate (kal'kū-lāt), v.i. 1. To make a computation; to arrive at a conclusion after weighing all the circumstances; to estimate by calculation; to deliberate; as, we calculate better for ourselves than for others.

The strong passions, whether good or bad, never calculate. F. W. Robertson.

2.† To speculate about future events; to predict. 'Old men, fools, and children calculate.' Shak.—3. To suppose or believe; to think; as, you are wrong there I calculate (comp. the similar uses of guess and reckon); also to think of doing something; to intend; as, a man calculates to go a journey. [United States.]

Calculating (kal'kū-lāt-ing), p. and a. 1. Having the power or habit of making arithmetical calculations; quick at arithmetical calculations.

The American calculating boy, Zerah Colburn, being asked how many black beans it would take to make ten white ones, answered, 'Ten if you skin them.' De Morgan.

2. Given to forethought and calculation; especially given to look ahead with thoughtful regard to self-interest; deliberate and selfish; scheming.

With his cool calculating disposition he easily got the better of his ardent rival. Godwin.

—Calculating machine, a machine by which the results of arithmetical operations may be obtained by inspection, such as the machine invented by Mr. Babbage. The objects aimed at in the last-named machine are, first, the performance of arithmetical calculations with absolute accuracy, and, second, the immediate transference of the results to copper plates, from which any number of copies may be printed without the possibility of error. In 1864 an instrument, constructed on the type of Babbage's by Messrs. Scheutz, Swedish engineers, was employed in calculating a large volume of life-tables for the British government, who declared they would never have been undertaken had not this machine been in existence. A machine invented in 1819 by M. Thomas of Colmar, and called an arithmometer, is now pretty extensively used for addition and subtraction and all operations that can be resolved into these two.

Calculation (kal-kū-lā'shon), n. 1. The act of calculating; the art, practice, or manner of computing by numbers; reckoning; computation; as, to perform a calculation; to find a result by calculation.

Whenever we speak of arithmetic as the science of calculation we in fact allude to that rudimental period of the science of numbers when pebbles (calculi) were used, as now among savages they often are, to facilitate the practice of counting. Trench.

2. A series of arithmetical processes set down in figures and bringing out a certain result; as, he showed me his calculation.—3. Estimate formed in the mind by comparing the various circumstances and facts which bear on the matter in hand.

The lazy gossips of the port,
Abhorrent of a calculation crost,
Began to chafe as at a personal wrong. Tennyson.

Calculative (kal'kū-lā-tiv), a. Pertaining to calculation; tending to calculate. 'Long habits of calculative dealings.' Burke.

Calculator (kal'kū-lā-tėr), n. One who calculates, computes, or reckons; one who estimates or considers the force and effect of causes with a view to form a correct estimate of the effects. 'Ambition is no exact calculator.' Burke.

Calculatory (kal'kū-la-to-ri), a. Belonging to calculation. Sherwood.

Calcule† (kal'kūl), n. [Fr. calcul.] Reckoning; computation. 'The general calcule exceeded eight millions.' Howell.

Calcule,† v.t. [Fr. calculer, L. calculare. See CALCULATE.] To calculate. Chaucer.

Calculifragous (kal-kū-lif'ra-gus), a. [L. calculus, a chalky pebble, and frango, fregi, to break.] In surg. having power to dissolve or break calculus or stone in the bladder; lithotritic.

Calculous, Calculose (kal'kū-lus, kal'kū-lōs), a. [See CALCULUS.] 1. Stony; gritty; hard like stone; as, a calculous concretion. 2. Arising from calculi, or stones in the bladder; caused by calculi; as, a calculous disorder.—3. Affected with the gravel or stone; as, a calculous person.

Calculus (kal'kū-lus), n. pl. Calculi (kal'kū-lī). [L., a pebble used for calculating or voting, from calx, a small stone, a counter.] 1. In pathol. a general term for inorganic concretions of various kinds formed in various parts of the body. Those concretions formed in the gall-bladder are called biliary calculi or gall-stones; those formed by a morbid deposition from the urine in the kidney or bladder are called urinary calculi; those found in the substance of the lungs or in the ramifications of the bronchi are called pulmonary calculi; and those formed in the salivary glands or their ducts are called salivary calculi. There are also gouty concretions, called arthritic calculi, and others called pancreatic calculi, lachrymal calculi, spermatic calculi, &c.—2. In math. a method of computation.—Differential calculus, the arithmetic of the infinitely small differences of variable quantities; the method of differencing quantities or of finding an infinitely small quantity, which, being taken infinite times, shall be equal to a given quantity. The cry of a bird to its mate or young.—11. In hunting, a note blown on the horn to encourage the hounds. 12. Naut. a whistle or pipe used by the boatswain and his mate to summon the sailors to their duty.—13. In fowling, the noise or cry of a fowl, or a pipe to call birds by imitating their voice.—14. Milit. a summons by bugle or pipe for the soldiers to perform any duty: as, a bugle-call.—15. In American land law, an object, course, distance, or other matter of description in a survey or grant, requiring or calling for a corresponding object, &c., on the land. Goodrich.—Call of the House, a parliamentary phrase implying an imperative summons sent to every member of the House to be present at a stated time, for the consideration of some important measure, or for ascertaining what members are absent without leave or just cause.—Call to the bar, the formal admission of a person to the rank of barrister.

Calla (kal'la), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Orontiaceæ. The known species are few and of widely different habitats. C. palustris occurs in the North of Europe and America. It has a creeping root-stock extremely acrid in taste, but which, when deprived of its causticity by maceration and boiling, is made by the Lapps into bread. The beautiful Richardia æthiopica was formerly included in this genus, and is still sometimes called Calla æthiopica.

Callan, Callant (kal'an, kal'ant), n. [O.Sc. galand, a young man, from Fr. galant, a gallant.] A young lad; a fine fellow. [Scotch.]

Ye're a daft callant, and I must correct you some of these days. Sir W. Scott.

Callat,† Callot† (kal'lat, kal'lot), n. Same as Callet.

Call-bell (kąl'bel), n. A stationary hand-bell rung by means of a clapper pivoted at one end, and acted on by means of a vertical plunger.

Call-bird (kąl'bẽrd), n. A bird taught to allure others into a snare.

Call-boy (kąl'boi), n. 1. A boy whose duty it is to call actors on to the stage at the proper moment.—2. The boy who repeats the orders of the captain of a steamboat to the steward.

Calle,† n. [Fr. cale. See CAUL.] A sort of cap. Chaucer.

Caller (kąl'ẽr), n. One who calls.

Caller (kal'ẽr), a. [From root of cold.] [Scotch.] 1. Cool; refreshing; as, a caller breeze.—2. Fresh; in proper season: as opposed to what is beginning to corrupt in consequence of being too long kept, or is actually in a state of putridity; as, caller herrings.

Callet† (kal'let), n. [Fr. caillette, a frivolous babbling woman, dim. from caille, a quail. The French use the quail as the type of an amorous nature: 'Chaud comme une caille.' Cotgrave. Probably this meaning of Fr. caille has arisen from confusion with a Celtic word: Ir. caile, a strumpet, Gael. caile, a hussey, a slut.] 1. A tattling or talkative woman; a scold; a gossip.

Come hither, you old callet, you tattling huswife. Gascoigne.

2. A trull; a drab; a lewd woman.

He call'd her whore: a beggar in his drink,
Could not have laid such terms upon his callet. Shak.

Callet† (kal'let), v.i. To rail; to scold. 'Callet like a butter-quean.' Rich. Brathwaite.

Calliard (kal'yärd), n. [Perhaps connected with Fr. caillou, a flinty pebble.] An English local name for any hard siliceous stone: often applied by miners and quarrymen to beds of cherty or siliceous limestone.

Callichroma (kal-i-krō'ma), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and chrōma, colour.] A genus of coleopterous insects, of the section Longicornes and family Cerambycidæ. The species of this genus emit a very agreeable odour, as the British Callichroma moschata, or musk-beetle. This species is about an inch long, entirely green or shaded with a blue or golden hue, and very common upon willows.

Callichthys (kal-ik'this), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and ichthys, a fish.] A genus of fish belonging to the section abdominal malacopterygians and family Siluridæ or sheat-fishes. The species generally frequent rivers and streams; they are natives of hot climates.

Callico (kal'i-kō), n. Same as Calico.

Callid (kal'lid), a. [L. callidus, expert, shrewd, from callum, hardened skin, especially on the hands, because persons who work long at an occupation have the skin of their hands thickened.] Skilled; expert; shrewd. [Rare.]

Callidity, Callidness (kal-lid'i-ti, kal'id-nes), n. [L. calliditas. See CALLID.] Skill; discernment; shrewdness. 'Her eagle-eyed callidity.' C. Smart.

Calligrapher (kal-lig'ra-fėr), n. One skilled in calligraphy.

Calligraphic, Calligraphical (kal-i-graf'ik, kal-i-graf'ik-al), a. Relating to calligraphy.

Calligraphist (kal-lig'ra-fist), n. One skilled in calligraphy.

Calligraphy (kal-lig'ra-fi), n. [Gr. kalligraphia — kallos, beauty, and graphō, to write.] The art of beautiful writing; fair or elegant writing or penmanship.

My calligraphy, a fair hand
Fit for a secretary. B. Jonson.

Callimanco (kal-i-mang'kō), n. See CALAMANCO.

Callimus (kal'li-mus), n. [Gr. kallimos, very beautiful.] In mineral. the loose and movable central core or stony matter in the cavities of aëtites or engle-stone.

Calling (kal'ing), n. 1. The act of one who or that which calls; crying; shouting; naming; summoning, &c. 'A calling of the sea.' Tennyson.—2. Divine summons; state of being divinely called; call.

Give diligence to make your calling and election sure. 2 Pet. i. 10.

3. A vocation; profession; trade; occupation or employment.—4. A body of persons following any profession. 'Not to impose celibacy on whole callings.' Hammond.

5.† Name; appellation; title.

I am more proud to be Sir Rowland's son,
His youngest son, and would not change that calling
To be adopted heir to Frederick. Shak.

—Calling of the plaintiff, a form in English courts of law of calling upon the plaintiff to appear in cases where, for want of sufficient evidence, he consents to be non-suited or to withdraw himself. Accordingly neither he nor any for him appears to answer the summons.—SYN. Occupation, employment, business, trade, profession, office, engagement, vocation.

Calling-crab (kal'ing-krab), n. The popular name for the species of tropical crabs constituting the genus Gelasimus. The males have one of the claws much larger than the other. This, when disturbed, they hold up before them, as if beckoning or calling upon some one. With the large claw they close up the mouth of their burrow.

Calling-hare (kal'ing-hār), n. See PIKA.

Callionymus (kal-li-on'i-mus), n. [Gr. kallōnymos.] A genus of acanthopterygious fishes of the goby family, known in England by the name of dragonets, and in Scotland as gowdies (gowd, gold), from their colour. They have no air-bladder, their eyes are close together at the top of the head, and their gill-openings are reduced to a small hole on each side of the nape. They live at the bottom of the sea, and are 10 to 12 inches long.

Calliope, from antique statue in Vatican.

Calliope (kal-li'o-pē), n. [Gr. Kalliopē, from kallos, beauty, and ops, the voice.] 1. In class. myth. the Muse that presides over eloquence and heroic poetry.—2. The name given, apparently on the lucus a non lucendo principle, to a musical instrument consisting of a number of steam whistles toned to produce different notes. Such instruments are sometimes to be seen and heard on American steamboats.

Callipash, Callipee (kal'i-pash, kal'i-pē). See CALIPASH, CALIPEE.

Callipers (kal'i-pėrz), n. pl. Compasses for gauging round bodies. See CALIBER.

Calliper-square (kal'i-pėr-skwār), n. See under CALIBRE.

Callipeva (kal-i-pē'va), n. The Mugil liza, a much-prized river mullet of the West Indies, which seldom ventures further seaward than the mouths of streams or the ponds and marshes. Its scales are used for ornaments, &c., and its roes form an excellent caviare.

Callistemma (kal-i-stem'ma), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and stemma, a crown.] See CALLISTEPHUS.

Callistephus (kal-lis'te-fus), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and stephos, a crown.] A genus of composite plants, containing a single species, the China aster, which has been long in cultivation, and is much prized as a hardy annual, remaining long in flower. The genus is often called Callistemma.

Callisthenic (kal-is-then'ik), a. Relating to callisthenics, or exercises for health or bodily symmetry.

When the morning occupations are concluded, these unfortunate young women perform what they call callisthenic exercises in the garden. I saw them to-day pulling the garden roller. Thackeray.

Callisthenics (kal-is-then'iks), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and sthenos, strength.] The art or practice of taking exercise for health, strength, or grace of movement.

Callithrix, Callitrix (kal'li-thriks, kal'li-triks), n. [Gr. kallos, beauty, and thrix, hair.] A Brazilian genus of platyrhine monkeys with non-prehensile tails. Called also Sagouin. See SAGOUIN.

Callitrichaceæ (kal'i-tri-kā''sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. kallitrichos, beautiful-haired.] A small nat. order of achlamydeous dicotyledonous plants, consisting of a few floating species with very simple monœcious flowers, the one kind consisting of a single stamen, and the other of a four-celled ovary with two styles. They all belong to the genus Callitriche, called in English water star-wort. They inhabit the still waters of Europe and North America. This order in some later works disappears, its species being referred to Caryophyllaceæ.

Callitriche (kal-lit'ri-kē), n. A genus of plants. See CALLITRICHACEÆ, STAR-WORT.

Callitris (kal'i-tris), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful.] A genus of conifers with small cones composed of four to six woody scales like those of Thuja. The wood of C. quadrivalvis is much used by the Turks for the floors and ceilings of their mosques, because they believe it to be imperishable. It supplies the aromatic gum-resin called sandarac. See SANDARAC.

Call-note (kal'nōt), n. The note or sound produced by the male of birds and some other animals to call the female. 'The chirping call-note of the gecko.' Owen.

Callography (kal-log'ra-fi), n. See CALLIGRAPHY.

Callose (kal'lōs), a. [See CALLOUS.] In bot. having callosities or hard spots; hardened.

Callosity (kal-los'i-ti), n. [Fr. callosité; L. callositas. See CALLOUS.] 1. The state or quality of being hardened or indurated.—2. In a concrete sense; any thickened or hardened part on the surface of the human body or that of any other animal, such as the hard and often somewhat bony lumps that arise in places exposed to constant pressure and friction; the cicatrized surfaces of old ulcers, wounds, &c.; the natural cutaneous thickenings on the buttocks of gibbons and other monkeys, &c.—3. In bot. any part of a plant unusually hard.

Callosoma (kal-lo-sō'ma), n. See CALOSOMA.

Callot (kal'ot), n. A cap. See CALOTTE.

Callotechnics (kal-lo-tek'niks), n. pl. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and technē, art.] The fine or ornamental arts. [Rare.]

Callous (kal'lus), a. [L. callosus, from callum, hard skin. See CALLID.] 1. Hard; hardened; indurated, as an ulcer, or the skin on some part of the body, from exposure to continuous pressure or friction. 'A callous cicatrice.' Holland. 'The patient rustic came, whose callous hand.' Goldsmith. 'A callous ulcer.' Dunglison.—2. Hardened in mind or feelings; insensible; unfeeling. 'The callous diplomatist.' Macaulay.

It is an immense blessing to be perfectly callous to ridicule. Dr. Arnold.

SYN. Hard, hardened, indurated, insensible, unfeeling, obdurate, unsusceptible.

Callously (kal'lus-li), adv. In a callous, hardened, or unfeeling manner.

Callousness (kal'lus-nes), n. The state of being callous: (a) hardness, induration: applied to the body. 'A callousness of his feet.' Jer. Taylor. (b) Insensibility of mind or heart. 'A callousness and numbness of soul.' Bentley.

Callow (kal'lō), n. [Possibly from A. Sax. calu, bald.] The stratum of vegetable earth lying above gravel, sand, or limestone, &c.; the top or rubble bed of a quarry, which must be removed to reach the rock. [Provincial.]

Callow (kal'lō), a. [O.E. calugh, calewe; A. Sax. calu, bald; cog. D. kaal, Sw. kal, G. kahl, bald.] Destitute of feathers; naked; unfledged, as a young bird; pertaining to the condition of a young bird. 'Callow young.' Milton. 'Callow down.' Drayton. 'My callow wing, that newly left the nest.' P. Fletcher.

Calluna (kal-lū'na), n. [Gr. kalluno, to make clean, from its use in making brooms.] A genus of plants, nat. order Ericaceæ, nearly allied to Erica, from which it is distinguished chiefly by the structure of its capsule and the small number of its seeds. There is but one species, C. vulgaris (the common heather), which covers and relieves much of the heath and moorland districts of Britain, and is found in the northern temperate and boreal regions of the Old World, and also in the New World, though it is there a rare plant.

Callus (kal'lus), n. [L. callus, callum, whence callous, callid.] 1. In anat. (a) a callosity. (b) A new growth of osseous matter between the extremities of fractured bones, serving to unite them.—2. In bot. any part of a plant unusually hard.—3. In hort. the new formation over the end of a cutting before it sends forth rootlets.

Calm (käm), a. [Fr. calme, calm; It. and Sp. calma, a calm; also in Sp. and Pg. the heat of the day; from L.L. cauma, the heat of the sun, Gr. kauma, heat, from kaiō, to burn, the hot part of the day being the period of rest. The change of au into al has probably been brought about by the influence of L. calor, heat.] 1. Still; quiet; being at rest; undisturbed; not agitated; not stormy.

Be calm, good wind. Shak.
Calm is the morn without a sound. Tennyson.
The bay was oily calm. Tennyson.

2. Undisturbed by passion; not agitated or excited; quiet; tranquil, as the mind, temper, or attention. 'Calm looks.' Shak. 'Calm words.' Shak.

People are generally calm at the misfortunes of others. Goldsmith.

—Calm, Tranquil, Placid, Quiet. Calm, when applied to the mind, is nearly synonymous with cool, and implies that the person remains unagitated, even though there may be considerable care and anxiety; tranquil implies that the mind is serene and free from anxiety. Calm is therefore the better word for the outward manner. Quiet, when applied to the disposition, implies that the person is naturally silent and undemonstrative. It implies also that one is free from external annoyances; as, leave him quiet. Placid is nearly allied in sense to tranquil, but denotes a more cheerful and settled state.

Calm (käm), n. Freedom from motion, agitation, or disturbance; stillness; tranquillity; quiet. 'The soul as even as a calm.' Shak. 'The unity and married calm of states.' Shak. 'Each perturbation smooth'd with outward calm.' Milton. 'Calms, and then winds variable.' Tennyson.—A dead calm, stark calm, or flat calm, terms used by seamen to denote the greatest possible calm.—Region of calms, or calm latitudes, on the tracts in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans on the confines of the trade-winds, where calms of long duration prevail. About the winter solstice its average northern limit is in 5° N., and in the months about the summer solstice about 12° N. The southern limit lies nearly always to the north of the equator, varying between 1° and 3° N.

Calm (käm), v.t. 1. To still; to quiet, as the wind or elements; to still, appease, allay, or pacify, as the mind or passions. 'To calm contending kings.' Shak.

She calmed its wild hair with a golden comb. Keats.

2.† To becalm.

Like to a ship that, having 'scaped a tempest,
Is straightway calm'd and boarded with a pirate. Shak.

Calm (käm), v.i. To become calm or serene; as, the tempest now began to calm.

Calmer (käm'ėr), n. One who or that which calms, or has the power to still and make quiet; one who or that which allays or pacifies.

Angling was a cheerer of his spirits, a diverter of sadness, a calmer of unquiet thoughts. Iz. Walton.

Calmly (käm'li), adv. In a calm manner; without disturbance, agitation, tumult, or violence; without passion; quietly. 'And calmly run on in obedience.' Shak. 'The gentle stream which calmly flows.' Denham.

Calmness (käm'nes), n. The state of being calm: (a) quietness; stillness; tranquillity, as of the elements. 'The gentle calmness of the flood.' Denham. (b) Quietness; mildness; unruffled state: applied to the mind, passions, or temper. 'Defend yourself by calmness or by absence.' Shak.—SYN. Quietness, quietude, stillness, tranquillity, serenity, repose, composure, sedateness, placidity.

Calmuc, Calmuck (kal'muk), n. 1. A member of a remarkable branch of the Mongol race, originally from Thibet, but now spread over a large portion of Asia.—2. The language spoken by the Calmucks.

Calmy (käm'i), a. Calm; quiet; peaceable. 'A still and calmy bay.' Spenser. 'Tezcuco's calmy lake.' Southey. [Poetical.]

Calochortus (kal-ō-kor'tus), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and chortos, grass.] A beautiful genus of bulbous plants from Columbia, Mexico, and California, nat. order Liliaceæ, nearly allied to the fritillary and tulip.

Calodendron (kal-ō-den'dron), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and dendron, a tree.] A genus of beautiful Diosma-like Cape Colony trees, nat. order Rutaceæ. C. capense is an evergreen tree 40 feet high, with beautiful flowers and foliage. Called also Calodendrum.

Calography (ka-log'ra-fi), n. Calligraphy (which see).

Calomel (kal'o-mel), n. [Gr. kalos, fair, good, and melas, black, perhaps because it was good for black bile.] (Hg Cl.) Hemi-, di-, sub-, or proto-chloride of mercury, or mercurous chloride; a preparation of mercury much used in medicine, and also found native as horn-quicksilver. It is prepared by grinding in a mortar sulphate of mercury with as much mercury as it already contains, and heating the compound which is formed with common salt until it sublimes. The calomel is thus produced in dimetric crystals, the prisms being generally united in fibrous masses. It is dirty-white and translucent.—Precipitated calomel is a white heavy powder, with a lemon-yellow tinge. It is tasteless, inodorous, and insoluble in water. It becomes gray on exposure to light.

Calophyllum (kal-ō-fil'um), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and phyllon, a leaf.] A genus of plants, nat. order Guttiferæ. The species are large timber-trees, with shining leaves which have numerous transverse parallel veins, giving the plants a very beautiful appearance; hence the name. C. Inophyllum yields a medical resin, the tacamahac of the East Indies. The seeds afford an oil which is used for burning, for making ointment, &c. C. Calaba (calaba-tree), a tropical evergreen tree 60 feet high, with an edible green fruit, is a native of the West Indies and Brazil, and yields another variety of tacamahac.

Caloric (ka-lor'ik), n. [L. calor, heat.] The name given to a supposed subtle imponderable fluid to which the sensation and phenomena of heat were formerly attributed.—Sensible and insensible caloric, obsolete for sensible and latent heat. See under HEAT.

Caloric (ka-lor'ik), a. Pertaining to caloric.—Caloric engine, a name given by Captain Ericsson to his improved air-engine, to distinguish it from other air-engines on the same principle. Such engines are similar in principle and mode of working to the ordinary steam-engine, their motive power being derived from air expanded by heat instead of steam. The distinctive features of the improved caloric engines are that the air employed is compressed before being heated, and that the greater part of the waste heat is saved and used again and again, so as to effect a great saving of fuel. Many such engines are used, especially in America, for printing-presses and the like.

Caloricity (kal-o-ris'i-ti), n. [Fr. caloricité.] That faculty in animals of developing a quantity of heat necessary to life, and to enable them to resist atmospheric cold, so as to preserve at all times and in every part a temperature nearly equal.

Caloriduct (ka-lor'i-dukt), n. [L. calor, heat, and duco, ductum, to lead.] A tube or passage for conveying heat. See CALIDUCT.

Calorie (ka-lo-rē), n. [Fr.] In physics, the quantity of heat necessary to raise the temperature of a kilogramme of water one degree Centigrade. It is the French conventional unit used in calorimetry.

Calorifacient (ka-lor'i-fā"shi-ent), a. Same as Calorificient.

Calorifère (ka-lor-i-fâr), n. [Fr., from L. calor, heat, and fero, to bear.] An apparatus for conveying and distributing heat; a term particularly applied to an apparatus for heating conservatories, &c., by means of hot water circulating in tubes.

Calorifiant (ka-lor'i-fi"ant). Same as Calorificient.

Calorific (kal-o-rif'ik), a. Capable of producing heat; causing heat; heating; calorifient; calorificient.

We distinguish the gravitative, luminiferous, and calorific properties of the sun. J. S. Mill.

—Calorific rays, certain rays emanating from the sun, which are not visible, and which are only manifested by their effects on the thermometer. Their presence is detected by placing a thermometer near the rays forming the solar spectrum by being transmitted through a glass prism. They are most powerful near the red end of the spectrum.

Calorification (ka-lor'i-fi-kā"shon), n. The production of heat, especially animal heat.

Calorificient, Calorifient (ka-lor'i-fi"shent, ka-lor'i-fi"ent), n. [L. calor, heat, and facio, to make.] Heat-producing; relating to the power of producing heat: a term applied by physiologists to materials of food of which the basis is carbon, as fat, gum, sugar, starch, and which are believed to be expended in the production of heat in the system. Written also Calorifiant.

Calorimeter (kal-o-rim'e-tėr), n. [L. calor, heat, and Gr. metron, measure.] An apparatus for measuring absolute quantities of heat or the specific or latent heat of bodies, as an instrument for measuring the heat given out by a body in cooling from the quantity of ice it melts or from the rise of temperature it produces in water around it.

Calorimetric (ka-lor'i-met"rik), a. Of or belonging to the use of the calorimeter.

Calorimetry (kal-o-rim'et-ri), n. The estimation of the specific or latent heat of bodies apart from the sensible changes of temperature; the art or process of using the calorimeter (which see).

Calorimotor (ka-lor'i-mō"tėr), n. [L. calor, heat, and motor, mover.] A galvanic instrument of one pair or a few pairs of very large plates to produce considerable heat effects, and in which the calorific influence or effects are attended by scarcely any electrical power.

Calorist (kal'or-ist), n. One of those who upheld the theory that the sensation and phenomena of heat were attributable to a fluid called caloric.

The theory of the calorists, as those who held this view were called, and called themselves, is now utterly disproved. Pop. Ency.

Calosoma (kal-o-sō'ma), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and sōma, body.] A genus of coleopterous insects of the family Carabidæ. To this genus belongs the largest and most beautiful British insect of the family, the C. Sycophanta, which is about 1 inch long. Species of this genus occur in almost all countries.

Calotropis (ka-lot'ro-pis), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and tropis, a keel, alluding to the keel of the flower.] A genus of plants, nat. order Asclepiadaceæ. The species are shrubs or small trees, natives of the tropics of the Old World. C. gigantea yields a tough fibre; its acrid juice is used for cutaneous diseases, and a tincture called mudar obtained from the roots is similarly employed. See MUDAR.

Calotte (ka-lot'), n. [Fr. calotte, a skull-cap, dim. of cale. See CAUL.] 1. A plain skull-cap or coif of hair, satin, or other stuff worn in Catholic countries as an ecclesiastical ornament, and in England by sergeants-at-law on their wigs; also, a military skull-cap. After the Bourbon restoration the epithet Régime de la Calotte was applied to the influence of the clergy in political matters. 2. Anything having the form of a small cap, as the cap of a sword-hilt.—3. In arch. a round cavity or depression in form of a cup or cap, lathed and plastered, used to diminish the elevation of a chapel, cabinet, alcove, &c., which would otherwise be too high for other pieces of the apartment. Sometimes written Calote.

Calottist (ka-lot'tist), n. A member of the Régiment de la Calotte, a society which sprang up at Paris in the last years of the reign of Louis XIV., and formed a regiment under the name La Calotte (a flat cap worn by the priests), which was the symbol of the society. All were admitted whose ridiculous behaviour, odd character, foolish opinions, &c., had exposed them to public criticism.

Calotype (kal'o-tīp), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and typos, figure, impression.] The name given by Mr. Talbot to the process which he invented about 1840 of producing photographs by the action of light upon nitrate of silver. The paper is first washed on one side with a solution of nitrate of silver; when dry it is immersed in a solution of iodide of potassium; and again, after drying, in a mixture of nitrate of silver solution, acetic acid, and gallic acid. The paper is now exposed to the luminous image in the camera, after which the paper is again soaked in a solution of nitrate of silver and gallic acid, when the latent image makes its appearance, and is fixed by hyposulphite of soda solution. From the negative image a positive is then easily obtained.

Caloyer (kal'o-yėr), n. [Fr., from Mod. Gr. kalogeros, from Gr. kalos, beautiful, and gerōn, Mod. Gr. geros, an old man, the g in Mod. Gr. being pronounced like y.] One of a sect of monks of the Greek Church. They are also divided into cenobites, who are employed in reciting their offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorets, who retire and live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in grottoes and caverns on the mountains, and live on alms furnished to them by the monasteries.

Calp (kalp), n. A sub-species of carbonate of lime, of a bluish-black, gray, or grayish-blue colour, its streak being white. It is intermediate between compact limestone and marl, and forms a division of the carboniferous limestones of Ireland. Called also Argillo-ferruginous Limestone.

Calp-slates (kalp'slāts), n. pl. A series of shale, calp, and flaggy sandstone strata developed in Ireland between the two great bands of carboniferous limestone.

Calque (kalk), v.t. In painting, to calk (which see).

Calquing (kalk'ing), n. In painting, calking (which see).

Caltha (kal'tha), n. [L. caltha, supposed to be our Calendula officinalis, or pot-marigold.] A genus of ranunculaceous plants, with stout creeping root-stocks, and showy flowers composed entirely of petaloid sepals. The carpels contain many seeds. These herbs are found in the temperate and cold regions of both hemispheres. C. palustris (marsh marigold) is common in meadows and marshy places, and about the edges of rivers and lakes in Britain. A double variety is cultivated in gardens.

Calthrop (kal'throp), n. See CALTROP.

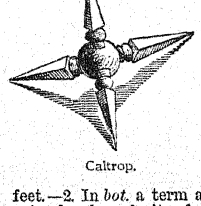
Caltrop (kal'trop), n. [L.L. calcitrapa, from L. calx, calcis, a heel, and L.L. trappa, a snare.] 1. Milit. an instrument with four iron points disposed in such a manner that three of them being on the ground the other points upward. These are scattered on the ground where an enemy's cavalry are to pass to impede their progress by wounding the horse's feet.—2. In bot. a term applied first to the spiny heads or fruits of several plants from their resemblance to the military instrument, and then to the plants themselves. The common caltrops is Centaurea Calcitrapa (the star-thistle), found in waste places in the south of England. The heads are covered with long yellow spines. The name is also given to Tribulus terrestris, a plant of the Mediterranean region, with a spiny pentagonal fruit. The water caltrop is Trapa natans, the fruit of which has several horns formed of the indurated lobes of the calyx.



Caltrop.

Calumba (ka-lum'ba), n. [From a mistaken notion that the plant came from Colombo,

Ceylon.] A plant, Jateorhiza palmata, indigenous to the forests of Mozambique, nat. order Menispermaceæ. The large roots are much used as a bitter tonic in cases of indigestion. American or false calumba is the bitter root of Frasera Carolinensis, a gentianaceous herb found in North America.

Calumbine (ka-lum'bīn), n. The bitter principle of calumba.

Calumbo (ka-lum'bō), n. Same as Calumba.

Calumet (kal'ū-met), n. [Fr. calumet, from Calumet, from the Christy Collection in British Museum.

L. calamus, a reed—a parallel form of chalumeau, a reed-pipe.] A kind of pipe used by the American Indians for smoking tobacco. Its bowl is usually of soft red soapstone, and the tube a long reed, ornamented with feathers. The calumet is used as a symbol or instrument of peace and war. To accept the calumet is to agree to the terms of peace, and to refuse it is to reject them. The calumet of peace is used to seal or ratify contracts and alliances, to receive strangers kindly, and to travel with safety. The calumet of war, differently made, is used to proclaim war.

Calumniate (ka-lum'ni-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. calumniated; ppr. calumniating. [L. calumnior, calumniatus, to calumniate, from calumnia, calumny. See CALUMNY.] To utter calumny regarding; to accuse, or charge falsely and knowingly, with some crime, offence, or something disreputable; to slander. 'To disdain and calumniate another.' Bp. Sprat. 'Calumniated by apostates.' Macaulay.—Asperse, Defame, Calumniate, Slander. See under ASPERSE.—SYN. To slander, defame, vilify, traduce, asperse, blacken, backbite, libel.

Calumniate (ka-lum'ni-āt), v.i. To charge one falsely and knowingly with a crime or offence; to propagate evil reports with a design to injure the reputation of another. 'Created only to calumniate.' Shak.

Calumniation (ka-lum'ni-ā"shon), n. The act of calumniating; calumny.

The slander and calumniation of her principal counsellors agreed best with the humours of some malecontents within the realm. Bacon.

These descriptions . . . are delivered dispassionately, and not thrown out in the heat of controversy and calumniation. T. Warton.

Calumniator (ka-lum'ni-ā"tėr), n. One who calumniates or slanders; one who falsely and knowingly accuses another of a crime or offence, or maliciously propagates false accusations or reports. 'The devil, the father of all calumniators and liars.' Usher. 'The calumniators of Epicurus's philosophy.' Cowley.

A wicked thing is a calumniator. Brougham.

SYN. Slanderer, defamer, backbiter, libeller, detractor, traducer.

Calumniatory (ka-lum'ni-a-to-ri), a. Slanderous. 'Calumniatory information.' Mountagu.

Calumnious (ka-lum'ni-us), a. Using calumny; containing or implying calumny; injurious to reputation; slanderous. 'Calumnious knave.' Shak. 'Calumnious misstatements.' Motley.

Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes. Shak.

For thither he assembled all his train,
. . . and with calumnious art
Of counterfeited truth thus held their ears. Milton.

Calumniously (ka-lum'ni-us-li), adv. In a calumnious manner; slanderously. Mountagu; Sheldon.

Calumniousness (ka-lum'ni-us-nes), n. The quality of being calumnious; slanderousness; defamation.

The bitterness of my stile was plainness, not calumniousness. Bp. Morton.

Calumny (kal'um-ni), n. [L. calumnia.] False accusation of a crime or offence, knowingly or maliciously made or reported, to the injury of another; untruths maliciously spoken to the detraction of another; defamatory reports; slander.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Shak.

Chaunteth not the brooding bee
Sweeter tones than calumny? Tennyson.

SYN. Slander, detraction, libel, falsehood, backbiting, evil-speaking, lying, defamation.

Calvary (kal'va-ri), n. [L. calvaria, a skull, used in the Vulgate to translate the Hebrew Golgotha, from calva, a scalp without the hair, from calvus, bald.] 1. A place of skulls; Golgotha; the place where Christ was crucified on a small hill west of Jerusalem.—2. In R. Cath. countries, a kind of chapel, sometimes erected on a hill near a city, and sometimes on the exterior of a church, as a place of devotion, in memory of the place where our Saviour suffered. In Calvaries of this sort the various scenes of his passion and crucifixion are represented by statuary and carving strongly coloured.—3. A rocky mound or hill on which three crosses are erected, an adjunct to religious houses. —Calvary cross, or cross of Calvary, see CROSS.

Calvary, formerly on Mont Valerian, Paris.

Calve (käv), v.i. pret. & pp. calved; ppr. calving. [From calf, pl. calves; comp. D. kalven, Dan. kalve, to calve.] To bring forth a calf or calves: used sometimes contemptuously of human beings, and by Milton of the earth at the creation of cattle, &c. 'Not Romans . . . though calved i' the porch o' the Capitol.' Shak.

Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve? Job xxxix. 1.

The grassy clods now calved. Milton.

Calver (kal'vėr), v.t. 1. In old cookery to prepare (fish) in a certain way, apparently by a kind of pickling. 'Larks, woodcocks, calver'd salmon.' Massinger.

My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmon, knots, godwits, lampreys. B. Jonson.

2. As a modern term, to crimp (fish). Nares.

Calver (kal'vėr), v.i. To be susceptible of being calvered. See above.

For his flesh (the grayling's), even in his worst season, is so firm, and will so easily calver that in plain truth he is very good meat at all times. Cotton.

Calves'-snout (kävz'snout), n. A plant, Antirrhinum majus, so called from a fancied resemblance in the seed-vessel to a calf's head. Called also Snapdragon.

Calville (kal-vil'), n. [Fr.] A sort of apple.

Calving (käv'ing), n. The act of bringing forth a calf: used specifically of cows, whales, and seals.

The Russians providently prohibit bay-whaling, a practice destructive to the cow whales about the time of calving. Prof. Ed. Forbes.

Calvinism (kal'vin-izm), n. The theological tenets or doctrines of John Calvin, who was born in Picardy in France, and in 1536 chosen professor of divinity and minister of a church in Geneva. The distinguishing doctrines of this system are, predestination, particular redemption, total depravity, irresistible grace, and the certain perseverance of the saints.

Calvinist (kal'vin-ist), n. A follower of Calvin; one who embraces the theological doctrines of Calvin.

Calvinistic, Calvinistical (kal-vin-ist'ik, kal-vin-ist'ik-al), a. Pertaining to Calvin or to his opinions in theology.

Calvinize (kal'vin-īz), v.t. To convert to Calvinism.

Calvish (käv'ish), a. Like a calf. Sheldon.

Calvities (kal-vi'shi-ēz), n. [L., from calvus, bald.] Diffused or general baldness, appearing generally first on the crown or on the forehead and temples.

Calvity† (kal'vi-ti), n. See CALVITIES.

Calx (kalks), n. pl. Calxes, Calces (kalk'sēz, kal'sēz). [L. calx, limestone, whence A.Sax. cealc, E. chalk.] 1. Properly lime or chalk, but applied formerly to the substance of a metal or mineral which remains after being subjected to violent heat or calcination. Metallic calxes are now generally called oxides.

Gold, that is more dense than lead, resists peremptorily all the dividing power of fire; and will not be reduced into a calx or lime by such operations as reduces lead into it. Sir K. Digby.

2. Lime recently prepared by calcination.—3. Broken and refuse glass, which is restored to the pots.

Calycanthaceæ (kal'i-kan-thā"sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. kalyx, a calyx, and anthos, a flower.] A nat. order of dicotyledonous plants, allied to Magnoliaceæ, but with aberrant characters which indicate affinities with other natural orders. They are hardy shrubs, well known in gardens for the delicious fragrance of their blossoms. The order contains only two genera—Calycanthus, the best known of the two species of which is C. floridus, or Carolina allspice, a sweet-scented shrub with yellow flowers, whose bark is used as cinnamon in the United States; and Chimonanthus, the only species of which, C. fragrans (Japan allspice), has lemon-coloured flowers.

Calycanthemous (kal-i-kan'the-mus), a. [Gr. kalyx, a calyx, and anthos, a flower.] In bot. a term applied to plants having the corolla and stamens inserted in the calyx.

Calycifloræ (ka-lis'i-flō"rē), n. pl. [L. calyx, a calyx, and flos, floris, a flower, a corolla.] According to Decandolle, a sub-class of dicotyledons or exogens, distinguished generally by having a calyx and corolla (dichlamydeous), petals separate (polypetalous or dipetalous) or united (monopetalous or gamopetalous), and the stamens inserted either on the side of the calyx (perigynous) or above and on the ovary (epigynous).

Calyciforal (ka-lis'i-flō"ral), a. In bot. having the petals and stamens springing from the tube of the calyx.

Calyciflorate (ka-lis'i-flō"rāt), a. In bot. having the stamens inserted in the calyx.

Calyciform (ka-lis'i-form), a. In bot. having the form of a calyx.

Calycinal, Calycine (ka-lis'i-nal, kal'i-sīn), a. In bot. pertaining to a calyx; situated on a calyx.

Calycle, Calycule (kal'i-kl, kal'i-kūl), n. [L. calyculus, dim. of calyx, Gr. kalyx, a calyx, a cup.] 1. In bot. an outer accessory calyx, or set of leaflets or bracts looking like a calyx, as in the pink.—2. In zool. a term applied to the small cuplike prominences, containing each a polype, covering the surface of many corals: better known as Calice (which see).

Calycled (kal'i-kld), a. Same as Calyculate (which see).

Calycoid (kā'li-koid), a. In bot. like a calyx; cup-shaped.

Calyculate, Calyculated (ka-lik'ū-lāt, ka-lik'ū-lā-ted), a. In bot. having bracts which resemble an additional external calyx.

Calymene (ka-lim'e-nē), n. A genus of fossil trilobites found in the Silurian rocks.

Calyon† (kal'yon), n. Flint or pebble stone, used in building walls, &c. Palsgrave; Promptorium Parvulorum.

Calypso (ka-lip'sō), n. [After Calypso, a mythological being of ancient Greece, celebrated for her beauty and fascination.] A genus of orchidaceous plants remarkable for their beauty. The C. borealis is a small tuberous plant found in high latitudes throughout the northern hemisphere, and having only a single thin, many-nerved leaf, and a single rose-coloured flower at the end of a slender sheathing stem. It grows in woods, especially of firs, appearing as soon as the snow melts.

a, Moss. b, Capsule with calyptra. c, Do. with calyptra removed.

Calyptra (ka-lip'tra), n. [Gr. kalyptra, a veil or covering.] In bot. the hood of the theca or capsule of mosses. It is the archegonium which has continued to grow and has been carried up by the elongation of the peduncle of the capsule. In liverworts the archegonium is burst through by the growing peduncle and the calyptra remains at its base. The same name is given to any hood-like body connected with the organs of fructification in flowering plants. In Pileanthus it covers over the flower and is formed of united bracts; in Eucalyptus and Eudesmia it is simply a lid or operculum to the stamens.

Calyptræidæ (ka-lip-trē'i-dē), n.pl. A family of gasteropodous molluscs, known by collectors as bonnet or chambered limpets. The typical genus Calyptræa includes the cup-and-saucer limpet.

Calyptrate (ka-lip'trāt), a. In bot. furnished with a calyptra; also applied to the calyx when it comes off like a lid or extinguisher.

Calyptriform (ka-lip'tri-form), a. Having the form of a calyptra.

Calystegia (kal-i-stē'ji-a), n. [Gr. kalyx, the calyx, and stegē, a covering, two bracts hiding the calyx.] A genus of plants, nat. order Convolvulaceæ, composed of species separated from Convolvulus because of the two large bracts which inclose the calyx. The species are lactescent, glabrous, twining or prostrate herbs, with solitary one-flowered peduncles. Two British species, C. sepium and C. Soldanella, are known by the name of bindweed.

Calyx (kā'liks), n. pl. Calyces, Calyxes (kā'li-sēz, kā'lik-sez). [L. calyx, the cup or calyx of a flower, from Gr. kalyx, a calyx, a husk or covering, from kalyptein, to cover, conceal.] 1. In bot. the exterior covering of a flower within the bracts and external to the corolla, which it incloses and supports, and consisting of several verticillate leaves called sepals, united by their margins (mono- or gamosepalous, b b) or distinct (poly- or dialysepalous, a a), usually of a green colour and of a less delicate texture than the corolla. In endogens the venation of the sepals is parallel, in exogens reticulated. The part formed by the union of the sepals is called the tube; the upper part, where the sepals are free, is the limb. In some plants the calyx grows to the sides of the ovary, except, perhaps, a small portion at the extremity, in which case it is termed superior, but when it is quite separate from the ovary it is called inferior.—2. In anat. a small cup-like membranous canal, several of which invest the points of the papillæ of the kidney. The union of the calyces forms the three infundibula which open into the pelvis of the kidney, whither they convey the urine.

Calzoons† (kal-zönz'), n. pl. [O.Fr. calçons, Mod. Fr. caleçons, from It. calzoni, aug. of calza, a stocking, from L. calceus, a shoe.] An under-garment worn on the lower limbs; drawers.

> The better sort of that sex here wear linen drawers or calzoons. Sir T. Herbert.

Cam (kam), n. [O.E. camb, a comb, a crest; comp. Dan. kam-hiul, G. kamm-rad, a cog-wheel, from kam, kamm, a comb.] In mach. a simple contrivance for converting a uniform rotatory motion into a varied rectilinear motion; a projecting part of a wheel or other revolving piece so placed as to give an alternating or varying motion to another piece that comes in contact with it and is free to move only in a certain direction; a cam-wheel. A common variety of the cam is that better known as the eccentric (which see). Various forms, such as those exemplified in figs. 1 and 2, are employed to impress accelerated or retarded motions. The form shown in fig. 3 is employed when two or more strokes of the rectilinear motion are required to be produced during one revolution of the rotatory part.—Solid cam, a form of cam employed when the series of changes in velocity and direction required are too numerous to be included in a single Cams.

1. Elliptical cam, used for giving motion to the levers of punching and shearing machines. 2, The heart-cam or heart-wheel, much used in cotton machinery to produce a regular ascent and descent of the rail on which the spindles are situated. 3, Form of cam much used in iron-works for setting in motion the tilt-hammers.

rotation of a cam-plate. The cam is formed on the surface of a cone, either parallel to the axis or spirally, and the cone as it revolves is made to travel also endlong by means of a screw. Usually the spindle passing through it is screwed and works in a fixed nut to communicate this endlong motion.

Cam (kam), a. [W. Gael. Ir. cam, crooked. Comp. Gr. kamptō, to bend.] Crooked; bending. See KAM.

Camaieu. n. See CAMAYEU.

Camail (ka-māl'), n. [Fr., a camail, also a head-dress worn by priests in winter, from Pr. capmail—cap, from L. caput, the head, and mail. See MAIL.] 1. Milit. the chain-mail or armour appertaining to the head-piece, as the casque or bascinet, and falling down from it over the shoulders like a tippet, so as to form a guard for the sides of the head, throat, and chest, worn by knights in the fourteenth and fifteen centuries.—2. Eccles. a name sometimes given to the almuce (which se).

Camail.

Camaldolite, Camaldulian (ka-mal'dolīt, kam-al-dū'li-an), n. A member of a nearly extinct fraternity of monks founded in the Vale of Camaldoli in the Apennines in 1018, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine monk. They were originally hermits, but as their wealth increased they associated in convents. They have always been distinguished for their extreme asceticism, their rules in regard to fasting, silence, and penances being most severe. Like the Benedictines they wear white robes.

Camara (kam'a-ra), n. A hard, tough, and durable wood obtained in Essequibo, from Dipteryx odorata. It is well adapted for shafts, mill-wheels, or cogs. Simmonds.

Camarilla (kam-a-ril'a, Sp. pron. ka-ma-rēl'ya), n. [Sp., a small room, a dim. from camara, L. camera, camara, a vault. See CHAMBER.] A company of secret counsellors or advisers; a cabal; a clique: from meaning the private chamber of the king, the word came to express collectively courtiers, sycophants, priests, and such unaccredited and secret councillors, in opposition to that of a legitimate ministry. 'Encircled with a dangerous camarilla.' Times newspaper.

Camassia (ka-mas'i-a), n. The latinized form of quamash, and the name of the genus to which that plant is referred. See QUAMASH.

Camata (kam'a-ta), n. The commercial name for the half-grown acorns of the Quercus Ægilops, dried and imported for tanning. In a still younger condition they are called camatina.

Camatina (kam-a-tī'na), n. The commercial name for the incipient acorns of the Quercus Ægilops, which are imported for tanning.

Camayeu, Camaieu (ka-mā'ū), n. [Fr. camaieu, a form equivalent to cameo (which see).] 1. A stone or an onyx engraved in relief; a cameo (which see).—2. In fine arts, monochrome painting or painting with a single colour, varied only by the effect of chiaro-oscuro. Pictures in two or three tints where the natural hues of the objects are not copied may also be called en camaieu. We speak of brown, red, yellow, green, and blue camaieus, according to their principal colours.

Cambaye (kam-bā'), n. A kind of cotton cloth made in Bengal and elsewhere in India.

Camber (kam'bėr), n. [Fr. cambrer, to arch, to vault, to bend, from L. camera, a vault, a chamber.] 1. A convexity upon an upper surface, as a deck amidships, a bridge, a beam, a lintel.—2. The curve of a ship's plank.—3. The part in a dockyard where timber is stored, and where cambering is performed; also, the small dock for loading and unloading timber.—Camber window, a window arched at the top.

Camber (kam'bėr), v.t. To arch; to bend; to curve ship-planks.

Camber-beam (kam'bėr-bēm), n. In arch. a beam which is laid upon the straining-beam of a truncated roof, and supports the covering of the summit.

Cambered (kam'bėrd), pp. or a. Bent upwards in the middle; arched; convex.—Cambered deck, (a) one which is higher in the middle or arched, but drooping toward the stem and stern. (b) An irregular deck.

Cambering (kam'bėr-ing), p. and a. Bending; arched; as, a deck lies cambering.

Camber-keeled (kam'bėr-kēld), a. Applied to a keel slightly arched upward in the middle of the length, but not so much as to be hogged.

Camberwell Beauty (kam'bėr-wel bū'ti), n. A rare British butterfly, Vanessa Antiopa, so named from having been sometimes found at Camberwell when it was more rural than now, and from its great beauty. The wings are deep, rich, velvety brown, with a band of black, containing a row of large blue spots around the brown, and an outer band or margin of pale yellow dappled with black spots. The caterpillar feeds on the willow.

Cambial (kam'bi-al), a. [L. cambialis, from L. cambio, to exchange.] Belonging to exchanges in commerce. [Rare.]

Cambist (kam'bist), n. [Fr. cambiste, from L. cambio, to exchange.] One who has to do with exchange, or is skilled in the science of exchange; one who deals in notes and bills of exchange; a banker.

> The word cambist, though a term of antiquity, is even now a technical word of some use among merchant traders and bankers. Rees.

Cambistry (kam'bis-tri), n. The science of exchange, weights, measures, &c.

Cambium (kam'bi-um), n. [L. cambio, to exchange, from the alterations occurring in it.] 1. In bot. a mucilaginous viscid substance forming a layer immediately under the liber of plants, now known to consist entirely of cellular tissue, composed of growing cells with very thin walls, retaining their primordial utricles, and largely charged with the fluid to which the name of cambium was once given. The growth of the wood and bark takes place in this layer.—2. A name formerly given to a fancied nutritious humour, which was supposed to repair the materials of which the body is composed.

Camblet (kam'blet), n. See CAMLET.

Camboge (kam-bōj' or kam-bōj'). See GAMBOGE.

Camboose (kam-bös'), n. Same as Caboose.

Cambrasine (kam'bra-sēn), n. A kind of fine linen cloth fabricated in Egypt, so called from resembling cambric.

Cambrel (kam'brel), n. A crooked piece of wood or iron to hang meat on. See GAMBREL.

Cambrian (kam'bri-an), a. Relating or pertaining to Wales or Cambria.

> The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds,
> That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.
> Thomson.

—Cambrian group, in geol. an extensive series of gritstones, sandstones, and slates, often metamorphosed into chlorite and mica schists, and gneiss, and lying under the lower Silurian beds. A few fossils occur in the series. They may be regarded as the bottom rocks of the Silurian system.

Cambrian (kam'bri-an), n. A Welshman.

Cambric (kām'brik), n. A species of fine white linen fabric, said to be named from Cambray in Flanders, where it was first manufactured. An imitation of cambric is also made of fine cotton yarn, hard twisted. 'Cadisses, cambrics, lawns.' Shak.

Cambro-Briton (kam'brō-brit-on), n. A Welshman.

Came (kām), pret. of come (which see).

Came (kām), n. In glazing, a small slender rod of cast lead, 12 or 14 inches long, of which, by drawing it through a species of vice, glaziers make their turned or milled lead for joining the panes or quarrels of glass.

Camel (kam'el), n. [From L. camelus, Gr. kamēlos, from Heb. gāmāl, camel.] 1. A large quadruped of the genus Camelus, family Camelidæ (or Tylopoda), and order Ruminantia, used in Asia and Africa for carrying burdens, and for riding on. It is characterized by the absence of horns, by having 16 teeth in the upper jaw—2 incisors, 2 canines, and 12 molars—and 18 in the lower—6 incisors, 2 canines, and 10 molars—and a fissure in the upper lip. It has a very long neck, and a broad elastic foot, ending in two small hoofs, which does not sink readily in the sand of the desert. The dromedary or Arabian camel (Camelus dromedarius) has only one adipose hump on the middle of the back, four callous protuberances on the fore legs, and two on the hind legs. It is a native of the Arabian deserts, and is chiefly confined to Arabia and Egypt in a domesticated state. There are two varieties, one strong and slow, for burdens, the other slighter and fleeter, for travelling. The Bactrian camel, or common camel (Camelus bactrianus), has two humps on the back, and is stouter and more muscular than the dromedary. The South American members of this family constitute the genus Auchenia (which see) or llamas; they have no humps. Camels constitute the riches of an Arabian, without them he could neither subsist, carry on trade, nor travel over sandy deserts. Their milk is his common food. By the camel's power of sustaining abstinence from drink for many days, and of subsisting on a few coarse, dry, prickly plants, it is peculiarly fitted for the parched and barren lands of Asia and Africa. Camels carry 600 to 1000 lbs. burden, and are rapid in their course. The hair of the camel is imported into this country chiefly for the purpose of being manufactured into fine pencils for drawing and painting. In the East, however, it serves for the fabrication of tents, carpets, and wearing apparel. The most esteemed hair comes from Persia.—2. A water-tight structure placed beneath a vessel to raise it in the water, in order to assist its passage over a shoal, a bar, or to enable it to be navigated in shoal water. It is first filled with water and sunk, in order to be fixed on. The water is then pumped out, when the camel gradually rises, lifting the vessel with it, and the process is continued until the ship is enabled to pass over the shoal. Camels have also been used for raising sunken vessels.

Camel-backed (kam'el-bakt), a. Having a back like a camel; hump-backed. 'Not that he was crook-shouldered or camel-backed.' Fuller.

Camel-bird (kam'el-bėrd), n. A name applied to the ostrich.

Cameleon (ka-mē'lē-on), n. Same as Chameleon.

Camelidæ (ka-mel'i-dē), n. pl. A family of quadrupeds, including the true camels of the eastern hemisphere, and the llamas of the western. They are classed among the ruminants, and have both canine and incisor teeth in the upper jaw.

Camelina (kam-e-lī'na), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferæ. C. sativa (gold of pleasure) has obovoid pods and small yellow flowers. It is found in Britain growing in cultivated fields, chiefly among flax.

Cameline,† n. Camlet; a stuff made of camel's hair. Chaucer.

Camel-insect, Camel-locust (kam'el-in'sekt, kam'el-lō'kust), n. Names given to orthopterous insects of the genus Mantis, or praying insects, from the long thorax resembling the elongated neck of the quadruped.

Camellia (ka-mel'i-a), n. [After George Joseph Kamel, a Moravian Jesuit.] A genus of beautiful trees or shrubs, nat. order Ternstrœmiaceæ, with showy flowers and elegant dark-green, shining, laurel-like leaves, nearly allied to the plants which yield tea. C. japonica is the origin of the many double varieties of our gardens. C. Sasanqua is mixed with tea in China, the leaves being said to give fragrance and flavour to other teas. All the species are natives of Asia and the Eastern Archipelago.

Camelopard (ka-mel'o-pärd or kam'el-o-pärd), n. [L. camelus, a camel, and pardalis, a leopard.] Same as Giraffe.

Camelopardalis (kam'el-o-pär"da-lis), n. 1. A genus of ruminant quadrupeds of which the camelopard (C. Giraffa) is the sole species. The genus is co-extensive with the family Camelopardidæ (which see).—2. A northern constellation formed by Hevelius, It is situated between Cepheus, Perseus, Ursa Major and Minor, and Draco, and contains thirty-two stars.

Camelopardel (ka-mel'o-pär-del), n. An imaginary beast of heraldic creation, formed by the addition of two long horns, slightly curved backward, on the head of the camelopard.

Camelopardidæ (kam'el-o-pär"di-dē), n.pl. A family of the Ruminantia, comprising only one genus, the Camelopard. See GIRAFFE.

Camelornithes (ka-mel'or-nī"thēz), n. pl. [Gr. kamēlos, a camel, and ornis, ornithos, a bird.] A name occasionally given to the family of birds which includes the ostrich, from their traversing the desert like camels.

Camelot † (kam'e-lot), n. Camlet.

Camelry (kam'el-ri), n. A place where camels are brought to be laden or unladen.

Camel's-hair (kam'elz-hār), n. The hair of the camel, imported into this country chiefly for the manufacture of fine pencils for drawing and painting.

Camel's Thorn (kam'elz thorn), n. A spiny leguminous plant, Alhagi Camelorum, of which the camel is very fond, and which yields a manna-like exudation from its leaves and branches.

Camel-swallower (kam"el-swol'lō-ėr), n. 1. A term applied to a weakly credulous person; one who swallows incredible stories.—2. A person severely punctilious in trifling matters, but loose in greater. See Mat. xxiii. 24.

Camelus (ka-mē'lus), n. The generic name of the camel, including two species, C. bactrianus and C. dromedarius. See CAMEL.

Camenes (ka-mē'nēz), n. In logic, a mnemonic word to express a syllogism in the fourth figure having one universal affirmative and one universal negative premiss and a universal negative conclusion.

Cameo (kam'ē-ō), n. [It. cameo, cammeo, from L.L. cammæus, a word of uncertain origin.] A general name for all stones cut in relief, in contradistinction to those hollowed out, or intaglios. More particularly, a cameo is a stone composed of several different coloured layers having a subject in relief cut upon one or more of the upper layers, an under layer of a different colour forming the ground. For this purpose the ancients used the onyx, sardonyx, agate, amethyst, &c. The shells of various molluscs, the inner strata of whose shells are sometimes differently coloured from the outer, are now much used for making cameos. Those best suited for the purpose are the bull's mouth, the shell of Cassis rufa, the warty helmet-shell of Cassis tuberosa, the horned helmet-shell of Cassis cornuta, and the queen-conch of Strombus gigas. Formerly written Camaieu.—Cameo incrustation, the art of producing bas-relief casts within a coating of flint-glass. The process consists in making the article to be incrusted of less fusible material than the glass, which is welded to the article in a soft condition.

Cameotype (kam'ē-ō-tīp), n. In photog. a name given to a small vignette daguerreotype for mounting in a jewelled setting like a cameo.

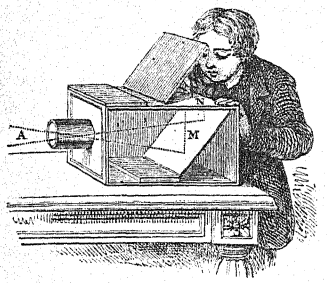
Camera (kam'ėr-a), n. [L., a vault, a chamber, from Gr. kamara, anything arched.] 1. In anc. arch. an arched roof, ceiling, or covering; a vault.—2. The variety of camera obscura used by photographers. See below. —Camera lucida [L., lit. clear chamber], an invention of Wollaston the chemist, for the purpose of facilitating the delineation of distant objects, by producing a reflected picture of them upon the paper, and also copying or reducing drawings. It consists of a solid prismatic piece of glass, mounted upon a brass frame. The prism has its angles so arranged that the rays from the object are reflected upon the paper, and is covered at top by a metallic eye-piece, the hole in which lies half over the edge of the prism, so as to afford a person looking through a view of the picture reflected through the glass, and a direct view of his pencil or tracing point. In the figure the object f to be traced is opposite the perpendicular surface of the prism d c, and the rays proceeding from f pass through this surface and fall on the inclined plane c b, making an angle with d c of 67½°; from this they are reflected at an equal angle to the plane b a, making an angle of 135° with b c, and are again reflected to the eye at e above the horizontal plane, which makes an angle of 67½° with the last reflection. The rays of light from the object, proceeding upwards from h towards the eye of the observer, the observer would be led to imagine the image at m, and by placing the paper below in this place, the image may be traced with a pencil. The brass frame of the prism has usually two lenses, one concave and the other convex, the former to be used in front between f and d c, for short-sighted persons, and the latter at e for long sights. The size of the picture may also be increased or diminished by lengthening or shortening brass tubes connected with the frame. This instrument has undergone various modifications. It is extremely convenient on account of its portability.—Camera obscura [L., lit. dark chamber], an apparatus in which the images of external objects, received through a double convex lens, are exhibited distinctly, and in their natural colours, on a white surface placed at the focus of the lens. The simplest form of this instrument consists of a darkened chamber, into which no light is permitted to enter, except by a small hole in the window shutter. A picture of the objects opposite the hole will then be seen on the wall or a white screen placed so as to receive the light coming from the opening. A convex lens may be fixed in the hole of the shutter. Portable cameræ obscuræ are constructed of various forms, but the design of them all is to throw the images of external objects, as persons, houses, trees, landscapes, &c., upon a plane or curved surface, for the purpose of drawing, amusement, or getting photographic pictures. The surface on which the image is seen may be paper, and thus, by introducing the hand, the figure may be traced with a pencil; but the picture is most distinctly seen when the image is formed on the back of a silverized mirror.



Camera Obscura.

The figure represents a portable camera obscura. A, rays of light passing through a convex lens and reflected from a mirror M placed at an angle of 45° upon a horizontal plate of ground glass N, where they form an uninverted image, and can be easily traced. The camera obscura employed by photographers is a box, one half of which slides into the other, with a tube in front containing an object-glass at its extremity. The object-glass is usually compound, which has the advantage of giving the same effective focal length as a single length of smaller radius of curvature, while it permits the employment of a larger aperture, and consequently gives more light. At the back of the box is a slide of ground glass, on which the image of the object to be depicted is thrown. The focussing is performed in the first place by sliding the one half of the box into the other, and then by means of a pinion attached to the tube in front which moves the lens. When the image has thus been rendered as sharp as possible, the ground-glass slide is removed and a sensitized slide substituted, which not only receives but retains the image.

Camerade† (kam'ér-ad), n. A comrade (which see). Phillips.

Cameralistic (kam'ér-a-list"ik), a. Pertaining to finance and public revenue. Smart. [Rare.]

Cameralistics (kam'ér-a-list'iks), n. [G. cameralist, a financier, from It. camerale, pertaining to a camera, or treasury, from L. camera, a chamber; comp. camerlingo.] The science of state finance. Brande & Cox. [Rare.]

Cameraria (kam-ér-ā'ri-a), n. [After Camerarius, a Nuremberg botanist.] A genus of handsome flowering plants, nat. order Apocynaceæ. The species are natives of hot climates, and are cultivated in our hothouses.

Camerate (kam'ér-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. camerated; ppr. camerating. [L. camero, camerare, from camera, an arched roof.] To build in the form of an arch or vault. [Rare.]

Camerated (kam'ér-āt-ed), a. 1. In arch. arched; vaulted; as, a camerated roof. Weale.—2. In conch. divided by partitions into a series of chambers; chambered; as, a camerated shell. Owen.

Cameration (kam-ér-ā'shon), n. An arching or vaulting. Evelyn. [Rare.]

Cameritelous (kam-ér-it'e-lus), a. [L. camera, a chamber, and tela, a web.] A term applied to spiders that make intricate webs to hide themselves.

Camerlingo (kä-mér-lēn'gō), n. [It., a chamberlain, from L. camera, a chamber.] The highest officer in the papal household; the chamberlain. The cardinale camerlingo was formerly the head of the government, having the control of the treasury, administering justice, and exercising almost sovereign power when the papal chair was vacant.

Cameronian (kam-ér-ō'ni-an), n. 1. One of the followers of Richard Cameron in Scotland, who refused to accept the indulgence granted to the Presbyterian clergy in the persecuting times of Charles II., lest by so doing they should be understood to recognize his ecclesiastical authority. They constituted the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the majority of which in 1876 joined the Free Church.—2. pl. A name given to the 26th Regiment of British infantry, from its having been originally raised out of the Cameronians who flocked to Edinburgh during the Revolution of 1688.

Camerostoma (kam-ér-os'tō-ma), n. [Gr. kamara, a vault, and stoma, a mouth.] The anterior part of the body of Arachnida, forming a vault over the manducatory organs.

Camese (ka-mēz'), n. [See CHEMISE.] A kind of shirt. 'With his snowy camese and his shaggy capote.' Byron.

Camion (kā'mi-on), n. [Fr.] A truck or wagon used for transporting cannon.

Camis,† Camise† (kam'is, ka-mēz'), n. [See CHEMISE.] A light loose dress or robe of silk or other material. 'All in a camis light of purple silk.' Spenser.

Camisade, Camisado (kam-i-sād', kam-i-sā'do), n. [Fr. camisade, Sp. camisado, O.Fr. camise, a shirt. See CHEMISE.] 1. A shirt worn by soldiers over their armour in a night attack to enable them to recognize each other. 'Two thousand of our best men, all in camisadoes with scaling ladders.' Sir R. Williams.—2. An attack by surprise at night or at break of day, when the enemy is supposed to be in bed, properly by soldiers wearing the camisado.

They had appointed the same night to have given a camisado on the English. Sir J. Hayward.

Camisard (kam'i-zärd), n. [From O.Fr. camise, a shirt; comp. camisade.] One of the French Calvinists of the Cevennes in revolt from 1688 till 1705.

Camisated† (kam'i-sāt-ed), a. [See CAMIS, CAMESE.] Dressed with a shirt above the other garments. Johnson.

Camisole (kam'i-sōl), n. [Fr., dim. of O.Fr. camise, L.L. camisa, a chemise.] 1. A short light garment worn by ladies when dressed in negligée.

Mrs. O'Dowd, the good housewife, arrayed in curl-papers and a camisole, felt that her duty was to act and not to sleep. Thackeray.

2. A strait-jacket put upon lunatics.—3. A sort of strait-jacket of stout sackcloth, very stiff and hard, fastened with several strong buckles, and with the sleeves sewed up at the ends so that the hands cannot get out, put upon a prisoner in France after condemnation to the guillotine, to prevent his injuring himself or others.

Camister (kam'is-tér), n. [Lit. one wearing a camis or camese.] A clergyman; a minister. [Vagabonds' slang.]

Camlet (kam'let), n. [See ANGORA GOAT.] A stuff originally made of camel's hair, now made sometimes of wool, sometimes of silk, sometimes of hair, especially that of goats, with wool or silk. The pure oriental camlet is made solely from the hair of the Angora goat. Sometimes written Camelot.

Camleted (kam'let-ed), a. Coloured, veined, or undulated like camlet. [Rare.]

Camletteen, Camletto (kam-let-tēn', kam-let'tō), n. A kind of fine worsted camlet.

Cammas (kam'mas), n. Quamash (which see).

Cammock (kam'ok), n. [A. Sax. cammoc.] A plant. Same as Rest-harrow. [Southern England.]

Cammocky (kam'ok-i), a. Having a disagreeable goat-like smell: a term applied to cheese from the idea that this smell is due to the cows eating cammock. [Southern England.]

Camomile (kam'ō-mīl), n. See CHAMOMILE.

Camorra (ka-mor'rä), n. A secret society in Naples and other large Neapolitan cities, whose members, styled Camorristi, exercised a lawless influence over the lower classes, appearing openly, and claiming the right of settling disputes, extorting a part of the money due for purchases, rents, wages, gaming, &c., and undertaking for money the commission of serious crimes.

Camouflet (ka-mö-flā), n. [Fr.] Milit. a mine with a charge so small as not to produce any crater. Such a mine is often sunk in the wall of earth between two parallel galleries, in order, by blowing the earth into one of them, to suffocate or cut off the retreat of the miner who is at work in it. When used for this purpose it is also called a Stifler.

Camous,† Camoused† (kā'mus, kā'must), a. [Fr. camus, Pr. camusat, flat-nosed, from Celt. cam, crooked, bent.] Depressed; flat; crooked: said only of the nose.

And though my nose be camous'd, my lips thick,
And my chin bristled, Pan, great Pan, was such.
B. Jonson.

Camously† (kā'mus-li), adv. Awry. Skelton.

Camoys† (ka-moiz'), a. Same as Camous. Sir T. Browne.

Camp (kamp), n. [Fr. camp, a camp, formerly also a field, a parallel form of champ, a field, both being from the L. campus, a plain. Campaign, champion are from this source.] 1. The place where an army or other body of men is or has been encamped; the collection of tents or other erections for the accommodation of a number of men, particularly troops in a temporary station; an encampment; as, to pitch a camp; there are many Roman camps in Britain. When an army in the field is to remain for some time at a particular spot, it may be stationed in an intrenched camp, surrounded by earth-works, redoubts, &c. A flying camp is one occupied for a very brief period. The camps of the ancient Roman soldiers, even though for only a night's stay, were of the intrenched kind, in the shape of a square surrounded by a fosse (fossa), with a stake-faced embankment (vallum) on the inside. There were four gates, one at either side and one at either end, and the interior was divided into streets, the broadest of which, 100 feet wide, ran between the side gates. The other streets, 50 feet wide, ran at right angles to this from end to end of the camp.—Camp of instruction, a camp formed for the reception of troops who are sent to be trained in manœuvring in large bodies and in campaigning duties in general. There is a permanent camp of this kind at Aldershot.—2. Body of troops moving and encamping together; an army.

For I shall sutler be Unto the camp, and profits will accrue. Shak.

The whole had the appearance of a splendid court rather than of a military armament; and in this situation, carrying more show than force with it, the camp arrived at Bernice. Hume.

3. In agri. a heap of turnips, potatoes, or other roots laid up for preserving through the winter. In some places called a Pie, in others a Bury.

Camp (kamp), v.t. 1. To put into or lodge in a camp, as an army; to encamp. [Rare.] 2. To afford camping ground for; to afford rest or lodging to. [Rare.]

Had our great palace the capacity
To camp this host, we would all sup together. Shak.

3. To bury in pits, as potatoes; to pit. Loudon. [Local.]

Camp (kamp), v.i. To live in a camp, as an army; to encamp.—To camp out, to live in a camp: especially applied to volunteers from their usually living in houses.

Are they also to build their own houses or to camp out in tents? Saturday Rev.

Camp (kamp), n. [A. Sax. camp, Dan. kamp, G. kampf, a fight, a contest, all, according to Skeat, from L. campus, a plain, and in late times a battle.] An ancient English form of the game of football. It was played by two parties of twelve men, ranged in two lines 120 yards apart. A ball was laid in the middle, and, on a given signal, each party rushed forward to kick or throw it to the opposite goal. The contest generally involved kicked shins, and sometimes serious injury.

Camp (kamp), v.i. To play at the game of camp. Tusser.

Campagnol (kam'pan-yol), n. [Fr. name, from campagne, open country.] A species of field-rat or vole, with a short tail, the Arvicola arvalis or agrestis.

Campaign (kam-pān'), n. [Fr. campagne, country, open country, campaign, from L. campania, a level country, campus, a plain. See CAMP.] 1. An open field; a large open plain; an extensive tract of ground without considerable hills. Garth.—2. The time, or the operations of an army during the time it keeps the field in one season; as, the campaign lasted six months.

Campaign (kam-pān'), v.i. To serve in a campaign. 'The officers who campaigned in the late rebellion.' Sir R. Musgrave. [Rare.]

Campaigner (kam-pān'ér), n. One who has served in an army several campaigns; an old soldier; a veteran.

Both horse and rider were old campaigners, and stood without moving a muscle. Smollett.

Campain (kam-pān'), n. Same as Campaign, 1.

Campana (kam-pā'na), n. [L.L. and It. campana, a bell.] 1. Eccles. a church bell. 2. A bell-like dish or cover used in making sulphuric acid.—3. In bot. the pasque-flower. 'Campana here he crops.' Drayton. 4. In arch. one of the drops or guttæ of the Doric architrave. Called also Campanula.

Campanal (kam-pā'nal), a. A term applied by Lindley to one of the largest of his alliances of plants, of which the bell-worts (Campanulaceæ) may be regarded as the type.

Campane (kam-pān'), n. [It. campana, a bell.] In her. a bell. See CAMPANED.

Campaned (kam-pānd'), pp. In her. bearing campanes or bells.

Campanero (kam-pa-nē'rō), n. [Sp., a bell-man, from L.L. campana, a bell.] The bell-bird (Arapunga alba) of South America, so called from the bell-like sound of its voice. See ARAPUNGA.

Campania † (kam-pā'ni-a), n. [See CAMPAIGN.] A large open plain; a champaign.

> In vast campanias there are few cities.
> Sir W. Temple.

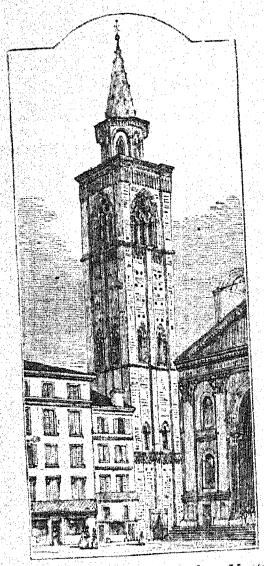
Campaniform (kam-pan'i-form), a. [L.L. campana, a bell, and forma, form.] In the shape of a bell: applied to flowers.

Campanile (kam-pa-nē'lā), n. pl. Campanili (kam-pa-nē'lē). [It. campanile, from It. and L.L. campana, a bell, said to be from Campania, in Italy, where bells were first used in divine service.] In arch. a clock or bell tower: a term applied especially to detached buildings in some parts of Italy, erected for the purpose of containing bells; also to such structures as the two western towers of St. Paul's Cathedral, St. Peter's at Rome, &c. Many of the campaniles of Italy are lofty and magnificent structures. That at Cremona is 395 feet high.



Campanile, Church of San Andrea, Mantua.

Campanologist (kam-pa-nol'o-jist), n. One skilled in the art of bell-ringing or campanology.

Campanology (kam-pa-nol'o-ji), n. [L.L. campana, a bell, and Gr. logos, discourse.] The art or principles of bell-ringing; a treatise on the art.

Campanula (kam-pan'ū-la), n. [L.L., a dim. of campana, a bell, from form of the corolla.] 1. The bell-flowers, a large genus of plants which gives its name to the nat. order Campanulaceæ. The species are herbaceous plants, with bell-shaped flowers usually of a blue or white colour. Nine species are indigenous to Britain, of which the most common and best known is the C. rotundifolia, bluebell of Scotland or harebell. (See HAREBELL.) Many species of Campanula are cultivated on account of their beautiful flowers.—2. In arch. see CAMPANA, 4.

Campanulaceæ (kam-pan'ū-lā"sē-ē), n. pl. The bell-worts, a nat. order of monopetalous dicotyledonous plants. The order consists of plants usually herbaceous, with an inferior two or more celled fruit, many minute seeds, regular bell-shaped showy blue or white corolla, and milky acrid juice. They are natives chiefly of northern and temperate regions.

Campanularia (kam-pan-ū-lā'ri-a), n. [See CAMPANULA.] A genus of zoophytes in which the polype-cells assume a bell-shape and are terminal on the footstalk.

Campanularida (kam-pan'ū-lā"ri-da), n. pl. An order of hydroid cœlenterates, of which Campanularia is the type.

Campanulate (kam-pan'ū-lāt), a. [L. campanula, a little bell.] In the form of a bell: applied to many parts of plants, particularly to the corolla.

Camp-bedstead (kamp'bed-sted), n. A bedstead made to fold up within a narrow space, as used in war; a tressel bedstead.

Camp-ceiling (kamp'sēl-ing), n. [From the roof approaching the shape of a tent.] In arch. a ceiling formed by an inclination of the wall on each side toward the plane surface in the middle, so as to form something like a coved ceiling. It is most frequently used in garrets.

Campeachy-wood (kam-pēch-i-wụd), n. [From the Bay of Campeachy, in Mexico.] Logwood (which see).

Camper (kam'pėr), n. One who plays at the game of camp. Tusser.

Campestral, Campestrian (kam-pes'tral, kam-pes'tri-an), a. [L. campestris, from campus, a field.] Pertaining to an open field; growing in a field or open ground.

> The campestral or wild beech is blacker and more durable. Mortimer.

Camp-fight (kamp'fīt), n. [See CAMP, a game, and CHAMPION.] In law, a trial by duel, or the legal combat of two champions, for the decision of a controversy.

Camp-follower (kamp'fol-lō-ėr), n. One who follows or attaches himself or herself to a camp or army without serving, such as a sutler.

> The troops were attended by a great multitude of camp-followers. Macaulay.

Camphene (kam'fēn), n. [A contr. for camphogen.] The generic name for the volatile oils or hydrocarbons, isomeric or polymeric with oil of turpentine, as oil of bergamot, cloves, copaiba, hops, juniper, orange, pepper, &c. Many camphenes exist ready formed in plants. They are liquid at ordinary temperatures, are distinguished from each other by their odours, and have an optical rotatory power. They absorb oxygen, and convert it into ozone. Also used as equivalent to Camphine.

Camphine (kam'fēn), n. The commercial term for purified oil of turpentine, obtained by distilling the oil over quicklime to free it from resin. It is used in lamps, and gives a very brilliant light; but, to prevent smoking, the lamp must have a very strong draught. With oxygen it forms camphor. Also written Camphene.

Camphine-lamp (kam'fēn-lamp), n. A lamp, with a very strong draught, for burning camphine. It has a reservoir, generally of glass, placed between the supporting pillar and the burner, to hold the spirit into which the cotton wick dips.

Camphire † (kam'fir), n. and v. Same as Camphor. 'Wood of aloes, camphire and many other things.' Hackluyt.

Camphired † (kam'fird), a. Impregnated with camphor; camphorated. 'Wash-balls perfumed, camphired and plain.' Tatler.

Camphogen (kam'fo-jen), n. [L.L. camphora, and Gr. genein, to produce.] ($C_{10}H_{14}$.) A colourless liquid produced by distilling camphor with phosphorous pentoxide. This hydrocarbon is better known under the name of Cymene.

Camphor (kam'fėr), n. [L.L. camphora; Fr. camphre, It. canfora, L.Gr. kaphoura, from Ar. kāfūr, camphor, which as well as Skr. karpūra, camphor, is said to be from a Malay word signifying literally chalk.] ($C_{10}H_{16}O$.) A whitish translucent substance, of a granular or foliated fracture, and somewhat unctuous to the touch. It has a bitterish aromatic taste and a strong characteristic smell. In chemical character it belongs to the vegetable oils. There are three varieties of this body, which differ from one another in their action on polarized light. The common camphor of the shops, which turns the plane of polarization to the right, is obtained from Camphora officinarum, and is chiefly prepared in the island of Formosa. Borneo camphor is the product of Dryobalanops Camphora, nat. order Dipteraceæ, a tree 100 to 130 feet high, found in Borneo and Sumatra. The common camphor is obtained from the wood by distillation and sublimation, and is a kind of stearoptene left after the elæoptene, or ethereal oil, of the live tree is evaporated. (See CAMPHOR-TREE.) Borneo camphor, on the other hand, is not procured by distillation, but is found in masses, secreted naturally in cavities in the trunk and greater branches. Camphor is used as a stimulant, antispasmodic, and diaphoretic. Besides these there is a third kind of camphor, known in China as Ngai camphor, and standing in point of value between ordinary camphor and Borneo camphor. It is the produce of Blumea balsamifera, a tall herbaceous plant common throughout the Indian Archipelago, and distinguished by the powerful smell of camphor emitted from the leaves when bruised.

Camphor (kam'fėr), v.t. To impregnate or wash with camphor. [Rare.]

Camphoraceous (kam-fėr-ā'shus), a. Of the nature of camphor; partaking of camphor.

Camphorate (kam'fėr-āt), v.t. To impregnate with camphor.

Camphorate (kam'fėr-āt), n. In chem. a compound of camphoric acid with different bases.

Camphorate (kam'fėr-āt), a. Pertaining to camphor, or impregnated with it. 'Camphorate liquors.' Boyle.

Camphorated (kam'fėr-āt-ed), a. Impregnated with camphor. 'A camphorated draught.' Dunglison.

Camphoric (kam-for'ik), a. Pertaining to camphor, or partaking of its qualities.—Camphoric acid ($C_{10}H_{16}O_4$), an acid obtained by distilling nitric acid several times in succession from camphor. There are three modifications of this acid, corresponding to the three camphors.

Camphor-oil (kam'fėr-oil), n. A fragrant, limpid, colourless oil obtained in Borneo and Sumatra from the Dryobalanops Camphora by distilling the wood with water.

Camphorosma (kam-fėr-oz'ma), n. [Camphor, and Gr. osmē, smell.] A genus of plants, nat. order Chenopodiaceæ. They are small shrubs and herbs, chiefly natives of the saline steppes of Central Asia. One species is known by the name of stinking ground-pine.

Camphor-tree (kam'fėr-trē), n. Camphora officinarum, nat. order Lauraceæ. The tree from which common camphor is obtained. It was originally considered to be a true laurel, but it differs from the genus Laurus in having ribbed leaves, nine stamens, and four-celled anthers. The wood is soft, easily worked, and useful for domestic purposes. All the parts of the tree yield camphor, but it is obtained chiefly from the wood. To obtain it the tree is cut down and divided into pieces, and the camphor which is found in small whitish flakes, situated perpendicularly in irregular veins in and near the centre of the tree, is distilled from the wood and then sublimed. It is then repeatedly soaked and washed in soapy water, to purify it from all extraneous matter. It is finally passed through three sieves of different texture, to separate it into three sorts—head, belly, and foot camphor.

Camphor-tree (Camphora officinarum).

Campion (kam'pi-on), n. [Probably from L. campus, a field, a plain.] The popular name of certain plants belonging to the genera Lychnis and Silene. Bladder-campion is Silene inflata; sea-campion, S. maritima; moss-campion, S. acaulis; red alpine-campion, Lychnis alpina; rose-campion, L. (or Agrostemma) coronaria and L. flos Jovis; red campion, L. diurna; and white campion, L. vespertina.

Camp-kettle (kamp'ket-l), n. An iron pot for the use of soldiers and others when camping out.

Camp-meeting (kamp'mēt-ing), n. A religious meeting held chiefly among the Methodists in the open air in America, where those who frequent the meetings encamp for some days for continuous devotion.

Campo (kam'pō), n. 1. The Portuguese name given to the wide grass plains of Brazil, once the site of forests.—2. A kind of Bohea or black tea.

Campong (kam'pong), n. A native village in the islands of the Eastern Archipelago.

Campshed (kamp'shed), n. Same as Camp-sheeting.

Camp-sheeting, Camp-sheathing (kamp'-shēt-ing, kamp'shēTH-ing), n. [A. Sax. camb, a ridge, and sheathing.] A piled inclosure formed of a guide pile, a wale, or a horizontal piece of timber, and a series of planks driven in, usually of the thickness of 3 inches, erected at the foot of an embankment or soft cutting to resist the outward thrust of the earthwork.

Camp-stool (kamp'stōl), n. A seat or stool with cross legs, so made as to fold up when not used.

Camptotropal (kamp-tot'ro-pal), a. [Gr. kamptos, curved, and trepō, to turn.] In bot. same as Campylotropal.

Camp-vinegar (kamp-vin'e-gėr), n. A mixture of vinegar with Cayenne pepper, soy, walnut-ketchup, anchovies, and garlic.

Campylite (kam'pi-līt), n. [Gr. kampylos, crooked.] A mineral, a variety of mimetite or arsenate of lead in which phosphoric largely replaces arsenic acid. It is found in Cumberland. The crystals are curved; hence the name.

Campylospermous (kam'pi-lō-spėr"mus), a. [Gr. kampylos, curved, and sperma, a seed.] In bot. having the albumen of the seed curved at the margin so as to form a longitudinal furrow, as in the fruits of some umbelliferous plants, as sweet cicely.

Campylotropal (kam-pi-lot'ro-pal), a. [Gr. kampylos, curved, and trepō, to turn.] In bot. a term applied to curved ovules in which the nucleus is folded over upon itself in the form of the letter U.

Camwood (kam'wụd), n. [Probably for Campeachy wood, from a notion that it came from Campeachy.] A red dye-wood imported from Sierra Leone, the produce of Baphia nitida, nat. order Leguminosæ. It is used with alum and tartar as a mordant, the dark red commonly seen on bandana handkerchiefs being generally produced by it. It is used also by turners for making knife-handles, and by cabinet-makers for ornamental knobs to furniture. Called also Barwood.

Can (kan), n. [A. Sax. canne, D. kan, Icel. kanna, G. kanne, a can.] A rather indefinite term applied to various vessels of no great size, now more especially to vessels made of sheet metal, for containing liquids, preserves, &c., generally cylindrical in form (as drinking cans), but in some cases of a square or of a conical form, and provided with a handle and spout, as oil-cans for lubricating purposes.

Can (kan), v.t. pret. & pp. canned; ppr. canning. To put into a can; as, to can preserved meat, fruit, &c.

Can (kan), v.t. and i. pret. could. [A. Sax. can, pres. ind. of cunnan, to know, to know how to do, to be able. In A. Sax. the pres. was can, canst, can, pl. cunnon, in all persons; the pret. was cūthe, for cunthe, the n being omitted and the vowel lengthened, as in mouth, tooth. Comp. Goth. kann, pret. kunṭha, and the other Teutonic forms; D. kunnen, to be able, pret. konde; Sw. kunna, Dan. kunde, to know, to be able, pret. kunde; Icel. kunna, to know, to be able; G. können, to be able, pret. konnte. The pp. was cūth, now only used in uncouth. The root is the same as that of ken and know. See KNOW.] 1.† (As an independent verb.) Canard (ka-när or ka-närd'), n. [Fr., a duck, from L.L. canardus, a kind of boat, from G. kahn, a boat or skiff.] 1. An absurd story which one attempts to impose on his hearers or readers; a fabricated story to which currency is given by some newspapers. This sense comes, according to Littré, from an old French phrase signifying 'to half-sell a duck,' in which the words meaning 'half' came to be suppressed. It is clear that to half-sell a duck is not to sell it at all; whence the sense of cheating, making a fool of. Cotgrave gives the term vendeur de canards à moitié (one who half-sells ducks) as meaning a cozener or liar.—2. A broadside cried in the streets, from the generally sensational nature of its contents.

Canarium (ka-nā'ri-um), n. [From canari, an eastern name.] A genus of plants, nat. order Amyridaceæ, consisting of lofty trees which exude resin or balsam. The exudation of one species resembles in its qualities balsam of copaiba; that of another is so like copal that it is used as a varnish in place of it. Dammar or damar is a brownish resin obtained from C. strictum. C. commune yields a fruit much prized in Java, from which an oil is expressed which is used at table and for lamps.

Canary (ka-nā'ri), n. 1. Wine made in the Canary Islands.—2. An old dance introduced into Spain from the Canary Islands, and thence brought to England.

Cancellate, Cancellated (kan'sel-āt, kan'sel-āt-ed), a. Separated into spaces or divisions, as by cancelli; specifically, (a) marked with lines crossing each other; marked lattice-wise.

> The tail of the castor is almost bald, though the beast is very hairy; and cancellated with some resemblance to the scales of fishes. N. Grew.

(b) In anat. containing cancelli having a peculiar kind of cellular structure, as certain portions of bones. (c) In bot. a term applied to leaves consisting entirely of veins, without connecting parenchyma, so that the whole leaf looks like a sheet of open net-work. Called also Cancellous.

Cancellation (kan-sel-lā'shon), n. The act of cancelling.

Cancelli (kan-sel'lī), n. pl. [L., a lattice, inclosure, balustrade, grating, &c.] Lattice-work; specifically, (a) in R. Cath. churches, the lattice-work partition between the choir and the body of the church, so constructed as not to intercept the view. (b) In compar. anat. the lattice-like cellular or spongy texture of bones, especially at the ends of long bones, and consisting of numerous spaces communicating with each other.

Cancellous (kan'sel-lus), a. Same as Cancellate. 'The cancellous texture of the bones.' Owen.

Cancer (kan'sėr), n. [L.] 1. The crab genus, a genus of ten-footed, anomural or short-tailed crustaceans, now used to include only the common European edible crab (C. pagurus) and a few allied species in North and South America and New Zealand. See CRAB. 2. In astron. one of the twelve signs of the zodiac, represented by the form of a crab, and limiting the sun's course northward in summer: hence, the sign of the summer solstice.—Tropic of Cancer. See TROPIC.—3. A morbid growth or structure which can extend itself and form again after removal, arising from a vitiated constitution and ending in ulceration: so called from the resemblance of the tumour, traversed by red markings, to a crab with extended claws. Cancer is divided into scirrhous, encephaloid, colloid, and epithelial cancer. Scirrhous cancer is a hard, firm, incompressible, and nodulated mass, at first non-adherent to the skin and attended with little or no pain. On section it is smooth and glistening, and exudes, on pressure, a small quantity of milky-looking juice. Encephaloid cancer is a soft elastic tumour, less circumscribed and increasing more rapidly than the preceding. It ends in a fungous vascular ulcer, to which the term fungus hæmatodes has been given, and which has a great tendency to bleed. Colloid cancer occurs most frequently in the stomach and alimentary canal, and consists of fibres arranged so as to form loculi, which contain a soft viscous matter of a yellowish, grayish, or reddish colour. Epithelial cancer, occurring on the skin and mucous membranes, commences as a hard little tubercle, often resembling a wart, and like the other varieties ends in an ulcer with an ichorous discharge.—Cancer bandage, a bandage resembling a crab in the number of its legs, and called the split-cloth of eight tails.

Cannipers (kan'ni-pėrz), n. pl. Same as Callipers. See CALLIPERS, CALIBER.

Cannon (kan'nun), n. pl. Cannons or same as sing.: Shakspere uses both forms with apparent indifference, so also Tennyson. [Fr. canon, a tube, a barrel, a cannon, from L. canna, a cane or reed.] 1. A large military engine for throwing balls and other missiles by the force of gunpowder; a big gun or piece of ordnance. Guns of this kind are made of iron, brass, bronze, or steel, and of different sizes, carrying balls from 3 or 4 lbs. weight up to 2000 lbs. Formerly the calibre or power of cannon was usually expressed by the weight of shot they fired, now their relative powers are usually gauged by the weight of the piece. Thus, prior to the introduction of armour-plated ships, the naval guns in use in line-of-battle ships and frigates were 68-pounders (95 cwts.), 8-inch shell-guns (65 cwts.), and 32-pounders (42 to 58 cwts.). Now we speak of ships armed with 6½, 12, 18, 25, 38, &c., ton guns, the 18-ton gun throwing 400-lb. projectiles, and the 25-ton gun 600-lb., and so on, the weight of the ball rising with the weight of the piece. Guns are now constructed weighing as much as 100 tons. The 100-ton gun is charged with 340 lbs. of powder, and discharges a bolt of steel or chilled iron of the weight of 2000 lbs. The smaller guns of this kind are called field-pieces. The principal parts of a cannon are—1st, the breech, which is more or less solid; 2d, the trunnions, which project on each side, and serve to support the cannon; 3d, the bore or calibre, the interior of the cylinder, wherein the powder and shot are lodged. The bore may be smooth or rifled, but rifled cannons are superseding the smooth-bores. Breech-loading cannons are now also largely adopted. Cannons are classified as guns, howitzers, carronades, and mortars; also as field, mountain, coast, sea, and siege guns. See ARMSTRONG-GUN, LANCASTER-GUN, WHITWORTH-GUN.—2. In mach. a hollow cylindrical piece through which a revolving shaft passes, and on which it is carried, and may revolve independently, and with a greater or less speed than that of the shaft. Example—the prolongation of the eye of a wheel, when bored to fit a spindle or shaft, on which it is intended to work loose, is termed a cannon, as the part a of the wheel A, loose on the shaft b.—3. In billiards, the act of hitting your adversary's ball with your own, so that your ball flies off and strikes the red, or vice versa; a carambole.

Cannon (kan'nun), v.i. In billiards, to make a cannon.

Cannonade (kan-nun-ād'), n. The act of discharging cannon and throwing balls, for the purpose of destroying an army or battering a town, ship, or fort. The term usually implies an attack of some continuance.

Cannonade (kan-nun-ād'), v.t. pret. & pp. cannonaded; ppr. cannonading. To attack with ordnance or artillery; to batter with cannon.

Cannonade (kan-nun-ād'), v.i. To discharge cannon; to fire off large guns. 'Both armies cannonaded all the ensuing day.' Tatler.

Cannon-ball (kan'nun-bąl), n. A ball, originally of stone, but now usually made of cast-iron or steel, to be thrown from cannon. Round projectiles are now to a great extent superseded by elongated ones, so that the term ball as applied to them is no longer strictly correct.—Cannon-ball tree, a name sometimes given to the Lecythis (Couroupita) Ollaria, on account of its cannon-ball-like fruit. See LECYTHIS.

Cannon-bone (kan'nun-bōn), n. See Canon-bone.

Cannon-bullet (kan'nun-bụl-let), n. A cannon-ball.

Cannoneer, Cannonier (kan-nun-ēr'), n. A man who manages cannon; an engineer.

> Let the kettle to the trumpets speak,
> The trumpets to the cannoneer without. Shak.

Cannoneering, Cannoniering (kan-nun-ēr'ing), n. The act or art of using cannons; practice with cannons. 'Gunnery, cannoneering, bombarding, mining.' Burke.

Cannoning† (kan'nun-ing), n. A loud noise, as of a cannon. Ant. Brewer.

Cannon-lock (kan'nun-lok), n. A contrivance placed over the touch-hole of a cannon to explode the charge.

Cannon-metal (kan'nun-met-al), n. Same as Gun-metal.

Cannon-pinion (kan'nun-pin-yon), n. In watchmaking, a squared tubular piece placed on the arbor of the centre-wheel, to hold the minute-hand and enable it to be turned by means of the watch-key. E. H. Knight.

Cannon-proof (kan'nun-prōf), a. Proof against cannon-shot.

Cannon-royal (kan'nun-roi-al), n. The name given to an old 66-pounder cannon, 8½ inches bore. E. H. Knight.

Cannon-shot (kan'nun-shot), n. 1. A ball for cannon.—2. The range or distance a cannon will throw a ball.

Cannon-stove (kan'nun-stōv), n. A kind of stove somewhat resembling a cannon erected on its breech. E. H. Knight.

Cannot (kan'not). Can and not. These words are usually united, but without any very good reason.

Cannula, Canula (kan'ū-la), n. [L., dim. of canna, a reed.] A small tube used by surgeons for various purposes, as for a sheath to a stylet or other sharp instrument, along with which it is thrust into a cavity or tumour containing a fluid; the perforation being made, the sharp instrument is withdrawn and the tube left, in order that the fluid may pass through it.

Cannular (kan'ū-lėr), a. [See CANNULA.] Tubular; having the form of a tube.

Canny, Cannie (kän'ni), a. [Perhaps directly from the Sc. noun can, knowledge, ability; at any rate from the same root. See CAN.] A Scotch and Northern English word whose meanings are exceedingly various, being used in different localities in different senses.—1. Cautious; prudent; knowing; wary; watchful.

> I trust in God to use the world as a canny and cunning master doth a knave servant. Rutherford.
> Whate'er he wins I'll guide with canny care.
> Ramsay.

2. Skilled; expert.

> His wife was a cannie body, and could dress things very well for ane in her line o' business.
> Sir W. Scott.

3. Moderate, as in charges, exactions, treatment, and the like; not extortionate or severe.—4. Gentle; quiet in disposition; tractable.—5. Easy; comfortable. 'Edge me into some canny post.' Ramsay.—6. Possessed of supernatural power; skilled in magic. 'Canny Elshie, or the wise wight o' Mucklestane moor.' Sir W. Scott. Hence, no canny, as applied to persons, is one dangerous, generally through having supernatural power; an act said to be no canny is often an act which entails supernatural dangers.

Canny, Cannie (kän'ni), adv. In a canny manner; cannily; cautiously; gently; slowly. 'Speak her fair and canny.' Sir W. Scott. —Ca' cannie (lit. drive gently), proceed with caution; don't act rashly.

Canoa† (ka-nō'ä), n. [Sp.] A canoe. Raleigh.

Canoe (ka-nō'), n. [Sp. canoa, from the native West Indian name.] A light boat, narrow in the beam, and adapted to be propelled by paddles. The name was originally given to boats used by rude nations, especially to such boats as are formed of the body or trunk of a tree, excavated by cutting or burning into a suitable shape; but canoes are also constructed of bark (as among the North American Indians), and similar boats are now used by civilized men for fishing and other purposes, and have been constructed of galvanized iron, caoutchouc, and paper.

Canoe-birch (ka-nö′bėrch), n. A tree, Betula papyracea, or paper-birch tree, the tough durable bark of which is used for making canoes in North America by the Indians and others. The canoes are light and can be carried on the shoulders, one holding four persons weighing no more than 40 or 50 lbs. The bark of the young trees is chalky-white.

Canoe-club (ka-nö′klub), n. An association of persons who practise the paddling of canoes.

Canon (kan′on), n. [A. Sax. canon, from L. canon, Gr. kanōn, a straight rod, a ruler, also a rule or standard—from kanē, a rarer form of kanna, kannē, a reed, a cane, whence also cannon.] 1. A law or rule in general. 'Contrary to thy established proclaimed edict and . . . canon.' Shak.—2. Eccles. a law or rule of doctrine or discipline, enacted by a council and confirmed by the sovereign; a decision of matters in religion, or a regulation of policy or discipline by a general or provincial council. 'Various canons which were made in councils held in the second century.' Hook.—3. The books of the Holy Scriptures universally received as genuine by Christian churches.—4. The rules of a religious order, or of persons devoted to a strictly religious life, as monks and nuns; also, the book in which such rules are written.—5. The catalogue of members of the chapter of a cathedral or collegiate church.—6. A dignitary who possesses a prebend or revenue allotted for the performance of divine service in a cathedral or collegiate church. In the Roman Catholic Church in England and elsewhere canons were formerly divided into three classes—regular, secular, and honorary. The regular canons lived in monasteries, and added the profession of vows to their other duties. Secular or lay canons did not live in monasteries, but they kept the canonical hours. (See under CANONICAL.) Honorary canons were not obliged to keep the hours. The name of foreign canons was given to such as did not officiate in their canonries: opposed to mansionary or residentiary canons. Canons of the English cathedrals must be in residence for three months each year. Collectively, with the dean at their head, they form the chapter. There are also canons of a lower grade, called minor canons, who assist in performing the daily choral service in the cathedral. Honorary canons may also be appointed, but receive no emolument.—7. A catalogue of saints acknowledged and canonized in the Roman Catholic Church.—8. The secret words of the mass from the preface to the pater, in the middle of which the priest consecrates the host. The people are to rehearse this part of the service on their knees, and in a voice lower than can be heard.—9. In music, a kind of perpetual fugue, in which the different parts, beginning one after another, repeat incessantly the same air.—10. In geom. and alg. a general rule for the solution of cases of a like nature.—11. In phar. a rule for compounding medicines.—12. In surg. an instrument used in sewing up wounds.—13. In printing, one of the largest kinds of type or letter used in a printing office: supposed to be so named because it was used in the printing of canons.—14. Same as Canon-bit.—Apostolic canons. See under APOSTOLIC.—Canons of inheritance, in law, rules directing the descent of real property throughout the lineal and collateral consanguinity of the ancestor, or, as he is technically called, the purchaser.—Canon of the mass. See above, 8.

Cañon, Canyon (kä-nyon′, kan′yun), n. [Sp. cañon, a cannon, a tube, a funnel, a canyon; L. canna, a reed.] A term applied originally by the Spanish Americans to long and narrow mountain gorges or deep ravines with precipitous and almost perpendicular sides occurring frequently in the Rocky Mountains, the Sierra Nevada, and the great western plateaus of North America. Some of them have a depth of 5000 feet below the general level of the country. See extract.

> The most distinctive features of the great basin are the cañons, those narrow, deep, abrupt, and continuous chasms, at the bottom of many of which run rapid rivers unapproachable by man or animal. They are due to the action of water, being formed by the passage through a dry region of never-failing and rapid streams, coming from distant sources exterior to the dry country. Nature.

Canon-bit (kan′on-bit), n. That part of a bit let into a horse's mouth.

Canon-bone (kan′on-bōn), n. The single metacarpal or metatarsal bone of certain animals, as the horse and all ruminants.

Canoness (kan′on-es), n. A woman who enjoys a prebend, affixed, by the foundation, to maids, without obliging them to make any vows or renounce the world.

> There are in popish countries women they call secular canonesses, living after the example of secular canons. Aylife.

Canonic (ka-non′ik), a. Same as Canonical but less common.

Canonical (ka-non′ik-al), a. [L. canonicus. See CANON.] Pertaining to a canon or rule; according to a canon or canons or to the canon.—Canonical age, the age which must be attained before one can become a deacon, a priest, or a bishop respectively.—Canonical books, or canonical Scriptures, those books of the Bible which are admitted by the canons of the church to be of divine origin. The Roman Catholic Church admits the books of the Apocrypha; the Protestants reject them.—Canonical hours, certain stated times of the day, fixed by the ecclesiastical laws and appropriated to the offices of prayer and devotion. In the R. Cath. Ch. the canonical hours are the seven periods of daily prayer, viz. matins with lauds, prime, tierce, sext, nones, evensong or vespers, and compline. In England the same name is also sometimes given to the hours from eight o'clock to twelve in the forenoon, before and after which marriage cannot be legally performed in a parish church.—Canonical letters, letters which passed between the orthodox clergy, as testimonials of their faith, to keep up the Catholic communion, and to distinguish them from heretics.—Canonical life, the method or rule of living prescribed by the ancient clergy who lived in community; a course of living prescribed for clerks, less rigid than the monastic and stricter than the secular.—Canonical obedience, submission to the canons of a church, especially the submission of the inferior clergy to their bishops, and other religious orders to their superiors.—Canonical punishments, such as the church may inflict, as excommunication, degradation, penance, &c.—Canonical sins, in the ancient church, those sins for which capital punishment was inflicted, as idolatry, murder, adultery, heresy, &c.

Canonically (ka-non′ik-al-li), adv. In a manner agreeable to the canon.—'Canonically admitted bishops.' Bale.

Canonicalness (ka-non′ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being canonical. 'The canonicalness of the apostolical constitutions.' Bp. Burnet.

Canonicals (ka-non′ik-alz), n. pl. The dress or habit prescribed by canon to be worn by officiating clergy; hence, a professional or official costume. Brewer enumerates as canonicals:—The pouch on the gown of an M.D.; the coif of a serjeant-at-law; the lamb-skin of a B.A. hood; the strings of an Oxford undergraduate; the tippet on a barrister's gown; proctors' and sub-proctors' tippets; &c. 'An ecclesiastic in full canonicals.' Macaulay.

Canonicate (ka-non′ik-āt), n. The office of a canon; a canonry.

Canonicity (kan-on-is′i-ti), n. The quality of being canonical; the state of belonging to the canon or genuine books of Scripture. 'The canoniecity, that is, the divine authority, of the books of the New Testament.' J. H. Newman.

Canonist (kan′on-ist), n. A professor of canon law; one skilled in the study and practice of ecclesiastical law. Donne; South.

> Thus far we have seen with what deliberation Pius the Ninth called to his council the cardinals, theologians and canonists of the Church of Rome. Cardinal Manning.

Canonistic (kan-on-ist′ik), a. Pertaining to the canonists.

> They became the apt scholars of this canonistic exposition. Milton.

Canonization (kan′on-iz-ā″shon), n. The act of canonizing a person; the act of ranking a deceased person in the catalogue of saints, called a canon. This act is preceded by beatification, and by an examination into the life and miracles of the person, after which the pope decrees the canonization.—Canonization, Beatification. Canonization is distinguished by Ferrara from beatification by this, that while beatification is simply a grant by the pope to a particular kingdom, province, religious body, or place, to venerate and invoke in the mass, and by exposition of relics, &c., some particular person deceased; canonization is a public and express definition of the apostolic see respecting the sanctity and glory of one, who is thereupon solemnly added to the roll of the saints, all the honours due to a saint being decreed to him.

Canonize (kan′on-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. canonized; ppr. canonizing. [From canon.] 1. To declare a man a saint, and rank him in the catalogue called a canon.

> The king, desirous to bring into the house of Lancaster celestial honour, became suitor to Pope Julius, to canonize King Henry VI. for a saint. Bacon.

2. To admit into the canon, as of Scripture. [Rare.]

> Bathsheba was so wise a woman that some of her counsels are canonized for divine. Fp. Hall.

Canonizer (kan′on-īz-ėr), n. One who canonizes.

Canon-law (kan′on-la), n. A collection of ecclesiastical constitutions for the regulation of the Church of Rome, consisting for the most part of ordinances of general and provincial councils, decrees promulgated by the popes, with the sanction of the cardinals, and decretal epistles and bulls of the popes. There is also a canon-law for the regulation of the Church of England, which, under certain restrictions, is used in ecclesiastical courts and in the courts of the two universities.

Canon-lawyer (kan′on-la′yėr), n. One versed in the canon-law.

Canonry, Canonship (kan′on-ri, kan′on-ship), n. The benefice filled by a canon.

Canon-wise † (kan′on-wīz), a. 'Versed in the canon-law. 'Canon-wise prelate.' Milton.

Canopic (ka-nop′ik), a. Of or pertaining to Canopus, in Egypt.—Canopic vases were vases used by Egyptian priests to hold the entrails of embalmed bodies, four being provided for each body. They were first used at Canopus, whence their name.

Canopied (kan′ō-pid), p. and a. Covered with a canopy, or as with a canopy. 'Canopied with golden clouds.' Chapman. 'A bank with ivy canopied.' Milton.

Canopus (ka-nō′pus), n. 1. A star of the first magnitude in the rudder of the constellation Argo.—2. An Egyptian jar, with a cover or top representing a human head or that of some animal, generally made of baked earth, and used for keeping water cool.

Niche with Canopy, Norwich Cathedral.

Canopy (kan-ō-pi), n. [Fr. canapé, O.Fr. conopé, L. conopeum, Gr. kōnōpeion, a pavilion, or net spread over a bed to keep off gnats, from kōnōps, a gnat.] 1. A covering fixed above a throne or a bed; a covering held over a person's heads as an honour. 'Golden canopies and beds of state.' Dryden.—2. In arch. a decoration serving as a hood or cover suspended over an altar, throne, chair of state, pulpit, and the like; also the ornamented projecting head of a niche or tabernacle. The label moulding or dripstone which surrounds the head of a door or window, if ornamented, is also called a canopy.

Canopy (kan′ō-pi), v.t. pret. & pp. canopied; ppr. canopying. To cover with a canopy, or as with a canopy. 'Trees . . . Which erst from heat did canopy the herd.' Shak. 'Beneath thy pinions canopy my head.' Keats.

Canorous (ka-nō′rus), a. [L. canorus, from cano, to sing.] Musical; tuneful. 'A long, loud, and canorous peal of laughter.' De Quincey.

> Birds that are most canorous . . . are of little throats and short. Sir T. Browne.

Canorousness (ka-nō'rus-nes), n. Musicalness.

Cant (kant), v.i. [From L. canto, freq. of cano, to sing.] 1. To speak with a whining voice or in an affected or assumed tone; to assume a particular tone and manner of speaking for the purpose of begging or exciting compassion; hence, to beg.—2. To make whining pretensions to goodness; to affect piety without sincerity; to sham holiness.—3. To talk in a certain special jargon; to use the words and phraseology peculiar to a particular sect, party, profession, and the like.

> The Doctor here,
> When he discourseth of dissection,
> Of vena cava and of vena porta,
> Of miseræum and the mesentericum,
> What does he else but cant? B. Jonson.

Cant (kant), n. 1. A whining or singing manner of speech; specifically, the whining speech of beggars, as in asking alms and making complaints of their distresses.—2. The language or jargon spoken by gipsies, thieves, professional beggars, and the like, and containing many words different from ordinary English; a kind of slang or argot. 3. The words and phrases peculiar to or characteristic of a sect, party, or profession; the dialect of a sect or set of people.

> Of all the cants which are canted in this canting world, though the cant of hypocrisy may be the worst, the cant of criticism is the most tormenting. Sterne.

4. A pretentious assumption of a religious character without sincerity; a hypocritical addiction to the use of religious phrases, &c.; religious phrases hypocritically used.

> That he (Richard Cromwell) was a good man, he evinced by proofs more satisfactory than deep groans or long sermons, by humility and suavity when he was at the height of human greatness, by cheerful resignation under cruel wrongs and misfortunes; but the cant then common in every guard-room gave him a disgust which he had not always the prudence to conceal. Macaulay.

Cant (kant), a. Of the nature of cant or slang; as, a cant word or phrase.

> The affectation of some late authors to introduce and multiply cant words is the most ruinous corruption in any language. Swift.

Cant (kant), n. Something given in charity. [Vagabonds' slang.]

Cant (kant), n. [Fr. encan, O.Fr. encant, incant, a call for bids at auction—en, in, to, and O.Fr. cant, for L. quantum, how much; lit. to how much (will you bid)?] A call for bidders at an auction; the act of crying out things for sale by auction.

> Numbers of these tenants are now offering to sell their leases by cant. Swift.

Cant (kant), v.t. [See the noun.] 1. To offer for sale by auction; to sell by auction.

> Is it not the general method of landlords to cant their land to the highest bidder? Swift.

2. To determine by bidding at an auction.

> When two monks were outvying each other in canting the price of an abbey, he (William Rufus) observed a third at some distance, who said never a word: the king demanded why he would not offer; the monk said he was poor, and besides would give nothing, if he were ever so rich; the king replied, then you are the fittest person to have it, and immediately gave it him. Swift.

Cant (kant), n. [Same word as Dan. Sw. and D. kant, edge, border, margin, &c.; G. kante, a side, a border or brim; O.Fr. cant, corner, angle (from this meaning 1 may be borrowed); also It. Sp. Pg. canto, side, edge, &c. The origin of the word is obscure.] 1.† A corner or retired place; an angle; a niche.

> The principal person in the temple was Irene or Peace; she was placed aloft in a cant. B. Jonson.

2. An external or salient angle. A bolt with a head having six angles is said to be six-canted.—3. One of the segments forming a side-piece in the head of a cask.—4. Cantharidin, Cantharidine (kan-thar'i-din, kan-thar'i-din), n. ($C_5H_{12}O_2$.) That peculiar substance which causes vesication existing in the Cantharis vesicatoria or Spanish fly. It is a volatile crystalline body, very soluble in ether, alcohol, and essential oils. Cantharidin is even better prepared from Mylabris cichorii than from the Spanish fly, as the former insect contains less fat. It is only when in solution that this body possesses vesicating powers.

Cantharis (kan'tha-ris), n. pl. Cantharides (kan-thar'i-dēz). [Gr. kantharis, a blistering fly.] A genus of coleopterous insects having the head separated from the thorax by a neck; the type of the family Cantharidæ. The best-known species is that which is sold in our laboratories under the name of the Spanish or blistering fly (C. vesicatoria). This insect is 9 or 10 lines in length, of a shining green colour mixed with azure. It has a nauseous smell, and is, when bruised, extensively used as the active element in vesicatory or blistering plasters. It feeds upon the leaves of trees and shrubs, preferring the ash. The largest come from Italy, but the best from Spain. Called also Lytta.

Cantharis-fly (Cantharis vesicatoria).

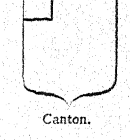
A small portion of land or division of territory; originally, a portion of territory on a border.—2. The inhabitants of such a division; a small tribe or clan.—3. A small portion or district of territory constituting a distinct state or government, as in Switzerland.—4. In her. a portion of the shield comprising a third part of the chief, and occupying always the dexter chief of the escutcheon, unless otherwise expressed.—5. A distinct part or division; as, the cantons of a painting or other representation, or of a flag.



Canton.

Canton (kan'ton), v.t. [Fr. cantonner. See above.] 1. To divide into cantons or districts, as territory; to divide into distinct portions; to separate off.

They canton out to themselves a little Goshen in the intellectual world. Locke.

2. To allot separate quarters to each regiment of; as, to canton an army or a detachment: in this sense pronounced kan-ton'.

Cantonal (kan'ton-al), a. Pertaining to a canton or cantons.

Cantoned (kan'tond), a. 1. In her. a term used of charges borne with a cross.—2. Furnished at the angles or sides with some projecting part: in arch. applied to a building when its corners are decorated with projecting pilasters or quoins. The expression is more particularly employed in describing the pillars of the Roman churches which have a projecting shaft on each of their faces or on each of their angles.

Cantonize (kan'ton-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. cantonized; ppr. cantonizing. To canton or divide into small districts.

Thus was all Ireland cantonized among ten persons of the English nation. Sir J. Davies.

Cantonment (kan-ton'ment), n. A part or division of a town or village assigned to a particular regiment of troops; the dwelling-places occupied by an army during any suspension of active operations in the field; the temporary shelter which an army may occasionally take, as when, during a season of excessive heat, the troops are distributed in villages, houses, &c., but so as not to be widely scattered. The term is often applied to a sort of military town or permanent station for troops in India.

Cantoon (kan-tōn'), n. A kind of fustian with a fine cord visible on one side.

Cantor (kan'tor), n. [L., a singer, from cano, cantum, to sing.] Eccles. an officer whose duty is to lead the singing in a cathedral, collegiate, or parish church; a precentor.

Canzonet (kan-zō-net'), n. [It. canzonetta. See CANZONE.] In music, (a) a little or short song, shorter and less elaborate than the arie of oratorio or opera. (b)† A short concerted air; a madrigal. 'The canzonet and roundelay.' Rogers.

Caoutchine, Caoutchoucine (kö'chin, kö'-chö-sin), n. An inflammable volatile oil produced by distillation of caoutchouc at a high temperature.

Caoutchouc (kö'chök), n. [A South American word.] An elastic gummy substance, Caoutchouc (Siphonia elastica).

which is the inspissated juice of several tropical plants; india-rubber; gum-elastic. Our chief supplies are from the South American Siphonia elastica (Hevea caoutchouc), a euphorbiaceous plant, and the East Indian Ficus elastica, nat. order Moraceæ. But it is found in considerable quantity in several apocynaceous plants, as the Urceola elastica of Sumatra, and also in Castilloa elastica, and various other artocarpads, &c. It is only, however, in the juice of tropical or sub-tropical plants that it exists in such proportion as to be of economical importance. The elasticity of this substance is very great. Cold renders it stiff and rigid, but heat soon restores its original elasticity. When exposed to the fire it softens, swells up, fuses, and burns with a bright flame. Caoutchouc has become an article of great importance in commerce and the arts. It is impervious to water, and is soluble in ether, naphtha, benzol, the essential oil of turpentine, &c. Thin coatings of it spread over cloth or any other substance render the material impervious alike to air and water. Air cushions and pillows are manufactured in this way, as are water-proof cloaks, hats, boots, shoes, &c. It is also extensively used in the manufacture of braces, belts, saddle-girths, flexible gas-tubes, and other articles. Caoutchouc is composed of 87·5 per cent. of carbon and 12·5 per cent. of hydrogen. By distillation it yields a number of hydrocarbons.—Vulcanized caoutchouc or india-rubber. See VULCANIZATION.

Cap (kap), n. [A. Sax. cæppe, a cap, cope, cape, hood, from L.L. capa, cappa, a cape or hooded cloak, whence also Sp. capa, It. cappa, Fr. chape, a cloak, cape, cover. Mahn thinks the L.L. cappa may be of Iberian origin. Cape and cope (in some of its meanings) are forms of the same word.] 1. A part of dress made to cover the head, a term very widely applied, but generally to head-coverings of softer material and less definite form than a hat, and without a brim.—2. The badge or ensign of some dignity; specifically, of a cardinalate.

He'll make his cap coequal with the crown. Shak.

3. The top or chief; the acme.

Thou art the cap of all the fools alive. Shak.

4. An act of respect made by uncovering the head.

Give a cap and make a leg in thanks. Fuller.

5. A certain size of paper. Full cap is 14×17 inches; double cap, 17×28. See also FOOLSCAP.—6. Anything resembling a cap in appearance, position, or use. In this sense the word has a great number of specific uses, of which the following are among the principal:—(a) In arch. the congeries of mouldings which form the head of a pier or pilaster. (b) In bot. the pileus of an agaric. See PILEUS. (c) In carp. the uppermost of any assemblage of parts. (d) In her. the figure of a cap used in charges, and as part of a crest or an accessory in a coat of arms, sometimes of very conventional shape. (e) The inner case which covers the movement of some kinds of watches, &c. (f) A percussion-cap (which see). (g) Naut. (1) a thick strong block of wood used to confine two masts together when one is erected at the head of another. (2) A term applied to square blocks of wood laid upon others, on which rests the keel of the vessel in the process of building. (3) A covering of tarred canvas for the end of a rope. (h) A small paper bag for holding groceries, &c., made by twisting up a sheet of paper in the form of a cone and twisting or folding the end to keep it firm.—Cap of a cannon, a piece of lead laid over the vent to keep the priming dry. Called also an Apron.—Cap of dignity or maintenance, a head tire formerly worn by dukes and commanders in token of excellency, now an ornament of state carried before the sovereigns of England at their coronation, and also before the mayors of some cities. It is of scarlet velvet turned up with ermine. In her. the figure of such a cap is often used to place crests upon instead of a wreath, and it also occurs as a charge. Also called Chapeau. See under MAINTENANCE.—To set one's cap at, to use measures to gain the affections of a man with a view to matrimony.

Cap (kap), v.t. pret. & pp. capped; ppr. capping. 1. Capillament (ka-pil'la-ment), n. [L. capillamentum, anything like hair.] A filament or fine fibre; specifically, in bot. the filament, the stalk of the stamen, a small fine thread like a hair. 'The solid capillaments of the nerves.' Bp. Berkeley.

Capillariness (kap'il-la-ri-nes or ka-pil'la-ri-nes), n. The state of being capillary; capillarity. [Rare.]

Capillarity (kap-il-lar'i-ti), n. The state or condition of being capillary.

Capillary (kap'il-la-ri or ka-pil'la-ri), a. [L. capillaris, from capillus, hair, from root of caput, the head.] 1. Resembling a hair, fine, minute, small in diameter though long; filiform; as, a capillary tube or pipe; a capillary vessel in animal bodies, such as the ramifications of the blood-vessels.—2. † Specifically, in bot. resembling hair in the manner of growth: applied in this sense by Ray, Boerhaave, and others to ferns.

Capillary or capillaceous plants are such as have no main stalk or stem, but grow to the ground, as hairs on the head; and which bear their seeds in little tufts or protuberances on the backside of their leaves. Quincy.

3. Pertaining to capillary tubes, or to the capillary vessels or capillaries in organic structures; as, capillary action.—Capillary tubes are tubes with very small bores, of which the diameter is only a half, a third, a fourth, &c., of a line. If a tube of this sort, open at both ends, be taken and one of its ends immersed in water, the water will rise within the tube to a sensible height above the surface of the water in the vessel, the height being inversely as the diameter of the bore, or the smaller the bore the greater the height. Different liquids rise in capillary tubes to different heights. The rise is owing to the attraction (called capillary attraction) which subsists between the fluid and the matter of the tube; consequently those liquids which do not adhere to or wet glass do not rise in capillary tubes of that material, but on the contrary stand lower within than without; thus, water, alcohol, ether, oils, &c., rise in narrow tubes of glass, metal, &c., having the surface clean, but if the surface is greased depression takes place instead of elevation. Mercury, on the other hand, is depressed in a glass tube, but rises in one of tin, to which it can adhere. Capillary attraction is exhibited in numberless instances in nature, as in the rising of the sap in vegetables and in the circulation of fluids in the porous tissues of animal bodies. The oil or grease rises in the wick of a lamp or candle by this principle.—Capillary repulsion, the repulsion which is exhibited when a capillary tube is dipped into mercury, so that the fluid stands lower within the tube than without.—Capillary vessels, in anat. the minute ramifications of the arteries and other vessels. They are also termed Capillaries.

Capillary (kap'il-la-ri or ka-pil'la-ri), n. 1. A tube with a small bore; specifically, a minute blood-vessel constituting the termination of an artery or vein; one of the minute vessels which intervene between the terminal arteries and veins. The diameter of the human capillaries in muscular tissue averages 0·003 of a line.—2. † In bot. a fern; especially applied to such ferns as grow like tufts of hair on walls. See the adjective. Sir T. Browne.

Capillation† (kap-il-lā'shon), n. A blood-vessel like a hair; a capillary. Sir T. Browne.

Capillature (ka-pil'la-tūr), n. A bush of hair; frizzling of the hair. [Rare.]

Capilliform (ka-pil'li-form), a. [L. capillus, a hair, and forma, form.] In the shape or form of a hair or of hairs; as, a capilliform fibre.

Capillitium (kap-il-li'shi-um), n. [L. capillus, a hair.] In bot. a kind of purse or net in which the sporules of some fungi are retained.

Capillose (kap'il-lōs), a. [See CAPILLARY.] Hairy; abounding with hair.

Capistrum (ka-pis'trum), n. [L. capistrum, a halter, muzzle.] In surg. a name given to several kinds of bandages for the head.

Capital (kap'i-tal), a. [L. capitalis, capital, deadly, also pre-eminent, from caput, the head.] 1. † Relating to the head; on the head.

Needs must the serpent now his capital bruise Expect with mortal pain. Milton.

2. First in importance; chief; principal; notable; metropolitan; as, a capital city or town. 'A capital article in religion.' Atterbury. 'Whatever is capital and essential in Christianity.' Is. Taylor.

This had been
Perhaps the capital seat, from whence had spread
All generations. Milton.

3. Affecting the head or life; incurring the forfeiture of life; punishable with death; as, treason and murder are capital offences or crimes.

Several cases deserve greater punishment than many crimes that are capital among us. Swift.

—Capital felonies are those crimes upon conviction of which the offender is condemned to death. In England these crimes are now restricted to treason and murder. In Scotland (where, however, felony is not a law term) murder, robbery, rape, and fire-raising are still capital crimes, but the practice is virtually the same as in England, capital conviction never being pressed for except in the case of murder.—4. Very good; excellent; first-class; as, a capital singer or player; a capital dinner; a capital fellow. [Mainly a colloq. usage.]

When the reading was over, nobody said capital, or even good, or even tolerable. T. Hook.

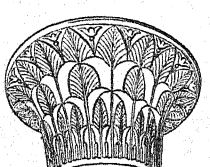
5. In writing and printing the term applied to letters of a particular form and of a larger size than the other letters in the same piece of writing or the same fount in printing. — Capital cross, in her. a cross corniced at each end.—Capital stock, the sum of money which a merchant, banker, or manufacturer embarks in any undertaking, or which he contributes to the common stock of a partnership; his capital invested. SYN. Chief, principal, leading, prominent, notable, essential, important, excellent, first-class, splendid.

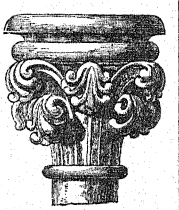
Capital Cross.

Capital (kap'i-tal), n. [Partly from L.L. capitellum, the capital of a pillar, capitulum, the same, also a chapter in a book; partly from the adjective capital, L. capitalis, chief, capital; all from caput, the head.] 1. The head or uppermost member of any part of a building; but generally applied in a restricted sense to the uppermost part of a column, pillar, or pilaster, serving as the head or crowning, and placed immediately over the shaft, and under the entablature. In class. arch. the different orders have their respective appropriate capitals, but in Egyptian, Indian, Moorish, Norman, and Gothic architecture they are endlessly diversified.—2. In fort. the line which bisects the salient angle of a ravelin. 3.† A chapter or section of a book.—4. By the customary omission of the noun, to which the adjective capital refers, it stands for (a) the chief city or town in a kingdom or state; a metropolis. (b) A type or letter of a certain form, and of a larger size than that commonly used in the body of a piece of writing or printing; a capital letter. (c) Money or wealth in some shape employed in trade, in manufactures, or in any business; stock in trade: in pol. econ. it is defined as the produce of industry which remains either in the shape of national or of individual wealth, after a portion of what is produced is consumed, and which is still available for further production. Capital may be applied either directly in the payment of labourers, or in providing tools and other auxiliary machinery, to assist their labour and increase its productiveness. The former is usually termed circulating capital and the latter fixed capital. Both, however, are indispensable to the progress of the arts and national wealth, and are used in combination.



Egyptian Capital.

Moorish Capital, Alhambra.



Gothic Capital, Salisbury Cathedral.

Capital, by persons wholly unused to reflect on the subject, is supposed to be synonymous with money. Mill.

(d) Fig. stock of any kind, whether physical or moral; means of influence or of increasing one's power.

The Lords have no constituents to talk to, and no speeches to make merely as political capital. Quart. Rev.

Capitalist (kap'i-tal-ist), n. A man who has a capital or stock in trade, usually denoting a man of large property, which is or may be employed in business.

I take the expenditure of the capitalist, not the value of the capital, as my standard. Burke.

Capitalization (kap'i-tal-iz-ā''shon), n. The act of capitalizing: (a) the act of applying as capital to the purposes of trade. (b) The act of computing or realizing the present value of a periodical payment. (c) The act of writing or printing in capitals.

Capitalize (kap'i-tal-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. capitalized; ppr. capitalizing. 1. To convert into capital: (a) to apply as capital to the purposes of trade. (b) To compute or realize the present value of a periodical payment for a definite or indefinite length of time; as, to capitalize a pension; to capitalize rents.

As to the project of capitalizing incomes, that is another affair. Times newspaper.

2. To form or print in capital letters. [Rare.]

Capitally (kap'i-tal-li), adv. In a capital manner: (a) so as to involve life. 'He was punished capitally.' Bp. Patrick. (b) In a pre-eminent degree; excellently; finely; as, she sang capitally. [Colloq.]

Capitalness (kap'i-tal-nes), n. State or quality of being capital; pre-eminence. [Rare.]

Capitan-pacha, Captain-pasha (kap-i-tan'pa-shạ', kap'tān or kap'tin pa-shạ'), n. The chief admiral of the Turkish fleet.

Capitate (kap'i-tāt), a. [L. capitatus, from caput, a head.] In bot. growing in a head; having a rounded head; pin-like: applied to a flower or stigma.

Capitation (kap-i-tā'shon), n. [L. capitatio, from caput, the head.] 1. Numeration by the head; a numbering of persons.—2. A tax or imposition upon each head or person; a poll-tax. Sir T. Browne. Sometimes written Capitation-tax.—Capitation grant, a grant of so much per head; specifically applied to grants from government to schools, on account of such scholars as pass a certain test examination, and to volunteer companies on account of such members as reach the stage of 'efficients.'

Capite (kap'i-tē). Ablative of L. caput, the head, used in such legal phrases as tenant or tenure in capite. A tenant in capite, or in chief, was anciently a tenant who held lands immediately of the king (the caput, head, or lord paramount of all lands in the kingdom), by knight's service or by socage, this tenure being called tenure in capite. It was abolished in England by 12 Charles II. xxiv.

Capitellate (ka-pit'el-lāt), a. [L. capitellum, dim. of caput, a head.] In bot. growing in small heads; capitular.

Capitol (kap'i-tol), n. [L. capitolium, from caput, the head.] 1. In ancient Rome, the name of a hill crowned by a temple dedicated to Jupiter and by a citadel, and also of the temple itself, in which the senate assembled. The same name was given to the principal temples of the Romans in their colonies.—2. In the United States, the edifice occupied by the Congress in their deliberations at Washington; also, in some states the state-house or house in which the legislature holds its sessions; a government house.

Capitolian (kap-i-tō'li-an), a. Pertaining to the Capitol in Rome.

Capitoline (kap'i-tol-īn), a. Pertaining to the Capitol in Rome, or to Jupiter, in whose honour the temple called the Capitol was erected.—Capitoline games, in ancient Rome, annual games originally instituted by Camillus in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus, and in commemoration of the preservation of the Capitol from the Gauls, and reinstituted, after having fallen into disuse, by Domitian, after which they were celebrated every fifth year.

Capitonidæ (kap-i-ton'i-dē), n. pl. [L. capito, large-headed.] The name sometimes given to a family of scansorial birds, the barbets, nearly allied to the toucans.

Capitular, Capitulary (ka-pit'ū-lėr, ka-pit'ū-la-ri), n. [L.L. capitulare, from L. capitulum, a chapter, a capital. See CAPITAL, n.] 1. An act passed in a chapter, as of knights or canons.—2. The body of laws or statutes of a chapter or of an ecclesiastical council. This name is also given to the laws, civil and ecclesiastical, made by Charlemagne and other princes in general councils and assemblies of the people. They are so called because they are divided into chapters or sections.—3. The member of a chapter. 'Statutes which shall bind the chapter itself, and all its members, or capitulars.' Ayliffe.

Capitular (ka-pit'ū-lėr), a. 1. Belonging to a chapter; capitulary.—2. In bot. growing in a capitulum or head, as the dandelion, and plants of the order Compositæ.

Capitularly (ka-pit'ū-lėr-li), adv. In the form of an ecclesiastical chapter.

The keeper, Sir Simon Harcourt, alleged you could do nothing but when all three were capitularly met. Swift.

Capitulary (ka-pit'ū-la-ri), a. Relating to the chapter of a cathedral. 'The capitulary acts of York Cathedral.' T. Warton.

Capitulate (ka-pit'ū-lāt), v.i. pret. & pp. capitulated; ppr. capitulating. [L.L. capitulo, capitulatum, to arrange in heads or chapters, from L. capitulum, a chapter, dim. of caput, the head.] 1.† To draw up a writing in chapters, heads, or articles; hence, to draw up articles of agreement; to arrange terms of agreement; to treat; also, to enter into an agreement; to confederate. 'Capitulate again with Rome's mechanics.' Shak.

Percy, Northumberland,
The archbishop's grace of York, Douglas, and Mortimer, Capitulate against us. Shak.

The king took it for a great indignity that thieves should offer to capitulate with him as enemies. Sir J. Hayward.

2. To surrender to an enemy on certain stipulated conditions: used especially regarding an army or garrison, when the terms of surrender are specified and agreed to by the parties.

Cromwell advanced to Edinburgh, where he was received without any opposition; and the castle that made long resistance did capitulate. Bp. Burnet.

Capitulation (ka-pit'ū-lā''shon), n. 1. The act of capitulating or surrendering to an enemy upon stipulated terms or conditions. 2. The treaty or instrument containing the conditions of surrender.—3. An article of agreement; formal agreement. 'With special capitulation that neither the Scots nor the French shall refortify.' Bp. Burnet. [Rare.] Specifically—4. (a) In old German polity, a contract which the emperor made with the electors, in the names of the princes and states of the empire, before he was raised to the imperial dignity. (b) See extract.

Capitulations is the name given to the immunities and privileges granted three centuries ago to France by the Ottoman Porte as an act of temporary and voluntary generosity, but which have been since converted by degrees into a series of one-sided engagements which now absolutely bind the Porte towards all the Powers. The same appellation was also bestowed on the conventions with the Swiss cantons, by which Holland, Spain, the Popes, the kings of Naples, and all the kings of France, from Louis XI. to Charles X., have taken Swiss regiments into their service. Blackwood's Mag.

Capitulator (ka-pit'ū-lā-tėr), n. One who capitulates.

Capitulum (ka-pit'ū-lum), n. [L., a small head or knob. See CAPITULATE.] 1. In anat. the head of a bone.—2. In bot. a close head of sessile flowers (as in the Compositæ); also, a term vaguely applied among fungals to the receptacle, pileus, or peridium. Treas. Bot. Called also Capitule.

Capivard (kap-i-vārd'), n. The Brazilian water-hog or capybara (which see).

Capivi (ka-pē'vi), n. A balsam of the Spanish West Indies. See COPAIBA.

Caple, n. See CAPEL.

Caplin, Capling (kap'lin, kap'ling), n. [Dim. of cap, or a corruption of coupling.] The cap or band of leather on a flail through which the thongs pass that connect the swingel to the staff. [Local.]

Caplin (kap'lin), n. [Fr. caplan, capelan. Etym. unknown.] A fish, the Salmo arcticus or Mallotus villosus, family Salmonidæ. It is about 6 or 7 inches long, and resembles a smelt in form and colour, but has very small scales. It is delicate eating, but its chief value is as bait for cod. This fish frequents the shores of Greenland, Iceland, Newfoundland, and Labrador in immense shoals, sometimes more than 50 miles in length and several miles broad.

Caplin (Salmo arcticus).

Cap-money (kap'mun-i), n. A fox-hunting term for the money collected for the huntsman on the death of the fox. The custom is now obsolete.

Capnomancy (kap'no-man-si), n. [Gr. kapnos, smoke, and manteia, divination.] Divination by the ascent or motion of smoke.

Capnomor (kap'no-mėr), n. [Gr. kapnos, smoke, and moira, a part.] ($C_{20}H_{22}O_2$.) A transparent colourless oil-like fluid obtained from the smoke of organic bodies or from the tar of wood.

Capoc (kap'ok), n. A fine short cotton of the East Indies, used chiefly to stuff cushions, line palanquins, &c.

Capocchia † (ka-poch'i-a), n. [It.] The feminine form of capocchio, a fool: used coaxingly by Pandarus to Cressida. 'Alas, poor wretch! a poor capocchia.' Shak.

Capoch, n. and v.t. See CAPOUCH.

Capon (kā'pon), n. [A. Sax. capun, borrowed from L. capo, Gr. kapōn—a capon, from a root seen in Gr. koptō, to cut.] 1. A castrated cock; a cock-chicken castrated for the purpose of improving the flesh for table.—2. Rarely used for a letter. It is said to have got this application from letters being often conveyed inside fowls. So poulet in French meant a fowl and a letter.

O, thy letter, thy letter; he's a good friend of mine;
Stand aside, good bearer. Boyet, you can carve;
Break up this capon. Shak.

Capon (kā'pon), v.t. To make a capon of.

Caponet † (kā'pon-et), n. A young capon.

Caponiere, Caponniere (kap-o-nēr', kap-on-nēr'), n. [Fr. caponnière, Sp. caponera, It. capponiera. Origin doubtful.] In fort. (a) a covered lodgment sunk 4 or 5 feet into a ditch for its defence, encompassed with a parapet about 2 feet high, serving to support several planks laden with earth. (b) A passage from one part of a work to the other, protected on the right and left by a wall or parapet, and sometimes covered overhead. When there is a parapet on one side only it is called a demi caponiere.

Caponize (kā'pon-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. caponized; ppr. caponizing. To make a capon of.

Capot (ka-pot'), n. [Fr. capot, a term at piquet, derived by Littré from cape, a hood or cape, a person that is capotted having, as it were, a hood thrown over his head. See CAPOTE.] A winning of all the tricks of cards at the game of piquet.

Capot (ka-pot'), v.t. pret. & pp. capotted; ppr. capotting. To win all the tricks from at piquet.

That last game I had with my sweet cousin I capotted her. Lamb.

Capote (ka-pōt'), n. [Fr. capote, from cape, a hood or cape, L.L. capa. See CAP.] A kind of long cloak. Byron.

Capouch,† Capoch † (ka-pōch'), n. [Fr. capuche, capuce, from It. capuccio, an aug. of L.L. capa, cappa, a hood, a cape.] A monk's cowl or hood; also, the hood of a cloak.

Capouch,† Capoch† (ka-pōch'), v.t. To cover with or as with a hood; hence, to blind or hoodwink.

Between the cicada and that we call a grasshopper the differences are very many, for first, they are differently cucullated or capouched upon the head and back. Sir T. Browne.

Cappadine (kap'pa-dīn), n. A sort of silk flock taken from the upper part of the silkworm's cocoon after the true silk has been wound off, used for shag in making rugs.

Cappagh Brown (kap'pach broun), n. Manganese-brown; a bituminous earth, coloured by oxide of manganese and iron, which yields pigments of various rich brown colours, two of which are distinguished as light and dark Cappagh browns. Cappagh brown derives its name from Cappagh, near Cork, in Ireland.

Cap-paper (kap'pā-pėr), n. 1. A coarse paper, so called from being used to make caps to hold commodities.—2. A kind of writing paper in large sheets, usually called foolscap.

Capparidaceæ (kap'pa-ri-dā"sē-ē), n. pl. [L. capparis, the caper.] A nat. order of dicotyledonous polypetalous herbaceous plants, shrubs, and trees, having four petals and sepals, a great number of stamens, and an ovary elevated upon a long stalk. All of them appear to be more or less acrid. Some of the American species are very poisonous; others act as vesicatories, and a few are merely stimulant, as the Capparis spinosa, or caper-bush, the flower-buds of which constitute the capers of the shops. One, the C. Sodada, or siwák, forms one of the most characteristic features in African vegetation from the Great Desert to the Niger. It is a bush or small tree yielding berries with a taste like pepper; which when dried constitute an important element in the food of the natives. Its burnt root yields no small quantity of salt.

Capparidaceous (kap'pa-ri-dā'shus), a. Pertaining to the Capparidaceæ.

Capparis (kap'pa-ris), n. A genus of plants, including the C. spinosa, or caper-bush; C. Sodada, or siwák, &c. See CAPER, CAPPARIDACEÆ.

Cap-peak (kap'pēk), n. A stiff piece in front of some kinds of caps.

Capped Quartz (kapt' kwarts), n. A variety of crystallized quartz, occurring in Cornwall, imbedded in compact quartz. On breaking the matrix the crystals are revealed, and a cast of their pyramidal terminations in intaglio is obtained.

Cappeline (kap'pel-īn), n. [L.L. capellina, cappellina, dim. of capa, a cape or cap.] A small skull-cap of iron worn by archers in the middle ages.

Capper (kap'ėr), n. One whose business is to make or sell caps.

Cappernoity, Cappernoited (kap'pėr-noi-ti, kap'pėr-noi-ted), a. [Icel. kapp, strife, and nýta, to use.] Crabbed; peevish. [Scotch.]

Capping-plane (kap'ing-plān), n. In joinery, a plane used for working the upper surface of staircase-rails.

Cap-pudding (kap'pụd-ing), n. A pudding rounded at the top, which top consists of currants, raisins, or the like, and resembles a cap.

Capra (kā'pra), n. [L., a she-goat.] The goat; a genus of ruminant mammals. See GOAT.

Caprate (kap'rāt), n. A salt of capric acid.

Caprella (ka-prel'la), n. [Dim. formed from L. capra, a she-goat.] See MANTIS-SHRIMP.

Capreolate (kap'rē-ō-lāt), a. [From L. capreolus, a wild goat, a tendril of a vine, dim. from caper, a goat.] In bot. having tendrils, or filiform spiral claspers, by which plants fasten themselves to other bodies, as in vines, peas, &c.

Capreolus† (ka-prē'ō-lus), n. [L. See above.] The tendril of a plant.

Capric (kap'rik), a. [L. caper, a goat.] Of or pertaining to a goat.—Capric acid ($C_{10}H_{20}O_2$), a peculiar acid first discovered by Chevreul in the butter of cow's milk, in which it exists along with butyric and caproic acids, as well as in the milk of the goat. It occurs also in cocoa-nut oil and in several kinds of fusel-oils. Called also Rutic Acid.

Capriccio (ka-prē'chō), n. [It., a caprice.] 1. A caprice; a whim. Shak.—2. A loose irregular kind of music, in which the composer is more guided by fancy than rule, allowing full scope to his imagination.

Capriccioso (ka-prē'chē-ō"zō), a. [It.] In music, a term denoting a free, fantastic style.

Caprice (ka-prēs'), n. [Fr. caprice, It. capriccio, whim, freak, fancy, originally a fantastical goat-leap, from L. caper, capra, a goat; comp. caper, capriole.] 1. A sudden start of the mind; a sudden change of opinion or humour; a whim, freak, or particular fancy. 'The caprice or whim of the bishop.' Swift.—2. Capriciousness.

Everywhere I observe in the feminine mind something of beautiful caprice, a floral exuberance of that charming wilfulness which characterizes our dear human sisters, I fear through all worlds. De Quincey.

SYN. Freak, whim, fancy, vagary, humour, whimsy, fickleness.

Caprichio † (ka-prich'i-o), n. [It. capriccio. See CAPRICE.] Caprice; freak; fancy. [In Butler's Hudibras we find a plural capriches rhyming with witches.]

Capricious (ka-pri'shus), a. Characterized by caprice; apt to change opinions suddenly, or to start from one's purpose; unsteady; changeable; fickle; subject to change or irregularity; as, a man of a capricious temper. 'An interval of such wonders, such strange and capricious revolutions.' Baker. 'Capricious humour.' Hugh Miller.—SYN. Freakish, whimsical, unsteady, changeable, fickle, fanciful.

Capriciously (ka-pri'shus-li), adv. In a capricious manner; whimsically.

Capriciousness (ka-pri'shus-nes), n. 1. The quality of being capricious; whimsicalness; unsteadiness of purpose or opinion. 'Great capriciousness of taste.' Pennant. 'The capriciousness of a sickly heart.' Irving.—2. Unsteadiness; liableness to sudden changes; as, the capriciousness of fortune.

Capricorn (kap'ri-korn), n. [L. capricornus—caper, a goat, and cornu, a horn.] One of the twelve signs of the zodiac, the winter solstice; represented on ancient monuments by the figure of a goat, or a figure having the fore part like a goat and the hind part like a fish. Its symbol is ♑.—Tropic of Capricorn. See TROPIC.—Capricorn Beetle, a name given to beetles of the genus Cerambyx.

Caprid (kap'rid), a. [L. caper, a goat.] Relating to that tribe of ruminant mammals of which the genus Capra is the type.

Caprideæ (kap'ri-dē), n. pl. [L. caper, a goat.] The goat tribe, a family of ruminating animals, in which the horns are directed upwards and backwards, and have a bony core. This group forms a subdivision of the family Cavicornia, in which the sheep, antelopes, and oxen are also included.

Caprificate (kap'ri-fi-kāt), v.t. pret. & pp. caprificated; ppr. caprificating. To perform the operation of caprification on.

Caprification (kap'ri-fi-kā"shon), n. [L. caprificatio, from caprificus, the wild fig-tree—caper, a goat, and ficus, a fig, from goats feeding on it.] 1. A process intended to accelerate the ripening of the fig, and to improve the fruit. It consists in suspending above the cultivated figs branches of the wild fig covered with a species of cynips, a kind of small insects, which spread themselves over the whole tree, and were supposed to produce the beneficial effects mentioned, either by distributing the pollen of the male flowers, or by puncturing the fruit. The practice, although of great antiquity, and very wide spread, is said to be quite useless and even injurious.—2. The fecundation of the female date-palms by shedding over them the pollen from the male plant.

Caprificus (kap-ri-fī'kus), n. The wild fig-tree.

Caprifole (kap'ri-fōl), n. [See next art.] Woodbine; honeysuckle. 'Eglantine and caprifole emong.' Spenser.

Caprifoliaceæ (kap'ri-fo-li-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. [From caprifolium, a name of the honeysuckle and its genus, from L. caper, a goat, and folium, a leaf.] A nat. order of monopetalous dicotyledons, allied to the Rubiaceæ. It includes a number of erect or twining shrubs and herbaceous plants, comprising the honeysuckle, elder, viburnum, and snowberry. The characteristics of the order are opposite leaves without stipules, free anthers, epipetalous stamens, and fruit not splitting open when ripe.

Caprifoliaceous (kap-ri-fo-li-ā"shus), a. Pertaining to the Caprifoliaceæ.

Caprifolium (kap-ri-fō'li-um), n. [L. caprifolium—caper, a goat, and folium, a leaf.] The name sometimes used for the genus of beautiful, fragrant, mostly twining shrubs, including the woodbine or honeysuckle; hence, the honeysuckle or woodbine.

Capriform (kap'ri-form), a. [L. caper, a goat, and forma, form.] Having the form of a goat, or of something belonging to a goat; as, capriform horns.

Caprigenous (kap-rij'en-us), a. [L. caprigenus.] Produced by a goat; belonging to the goat kind.

Caprimulgidæ (kap-ri-mul'ji-dē), n. pl. The goat-suckers, a family of insessorial, fissirostral birds, nearly allied to the Hirundinidæ or swallow tribe, remarkable for their nocturnal habits, light and rapid flight, and great activity. There is only one European species, the common goat-sucker (Caprimulgus europæus), a summer visitant in Britain. Several are found in America, one of which is known as the whip-poor-will, and another as the night-hawk. See GOAT-SUCKER.

Caprimulginæ (kap-ri-mul-jī'nē), n. pl. A sub-family of the Caprimulgidæ.

Caprimulgus (kap'ri-mul'gus), n. [L. capra, a she-goat, and mulgeo, to milk.] The typical genus of the Caprimulgidæ or goat-suckers. See CAPRIMULGIDÆ.

Caprin, Caprine (kap'rin), n. A substance found in butter, which, with butyrine and caprone, gives the butter its peculiar agreeable taste and odour. It is a compound of capric acid and glycerine, or a caprate of glycerine.

Caprine (kap'rīn), a. [L. caprinus, from caper, capra, a goat.] Like a goat; pertaining to a goat. 'Their physiognomy is canine, vulpine, caprine.' Bp. Gauden.

Capriole (kap'ri-ōl), n. [O.Fr. capriole, now cabriole, lit. a goat-leap, from L. capriolus, a wild goat, from caper, a goat.] 1. A caper or leap, as in dancing; an active bound; a spring. 'With lofty turns and caprioles.' Sir J. Davies.—2. In the manege, a leap that a horse makes in the same place without advancing, in such a manner that when he is at the height of the leap he jerks out with his hind-legs.—3. A kind of head-dress worn by ladies.

Capriole (kap'ri-ōl), v.i. To execute a capriole.

> Far over the billowy sea of heads may be seen Rascality caprioling on horses from the royal stud. Carlyle.

Cap-sheaf (kap'shēf), n. The top sheaf of a stack of grain; the crowner.

Capsicine (kap'si-sin), n. An alkaloid, the active principle of the capsules of Capsicum annuum, or Cayenne pepper. It has a resinous aspect and a burning taste. It is soluble in alcohol, and forms crystallizable salts with acetic, nitric, and sulphuric acids.

Capsicum (kap'si-kum), n. [New L., from L. capsa, a box, from the shape of the fruit.] A genus of South American and Asiatic annual sub-shrubby plants, nat. order Solanaceæ, with a wheel-shaped corolla, projecting and converging stamens, and a many-seeded berry. Many of the species are cultivated for their fruit, which in some reaches the size of an orange, is fleshy and variously coloured, and contains a pungent principle (capsicine), which is present also, and more largely, in the seed. The fruit or pod is used for pickles, sauces, &c., and also in medicine, both externally and internally. Cayenne pepper consists of the ground pods of C. frutescens and C. annuum. The latter species, called Guinea pepper, produces the fruit known as chillies. C. baccatum is the berry-bearing capsicum or bird-pepper, and C. fruticosum is the goat-pepper, which is much hotter than the other species. C. grossum, or bell-pepper, is an East Indian species with large capsules.

Capsicum annuum.

Cap-sill (kap'sil), n. The upper horizontal beam in the timber-framing of bridges, viaducts, &c.

Capsize (kap-sīz'), v.t. pret. & pp. capsized; ppr. capsizing. [Origin doubtful: probably the first syllable means head or top, and is ultimately from L. caput. Skeat suggests that the Sp. cabecear, to nod the head in sleep, and in nautical language to pitch (from cabeza, head), may be the origin.] To upset or overturn. 'What if carrying sail capsize the boat?' Byron.

Capsize (kap-sīz'), v.i. To be upset or overturned; as, take care the boat does not capsize.

Capsize (kap-sīz'), n. An upset; an overturn.

Carambole (kä-ram-bōl'), n. [Fr.] In billiards, (a) the red ball placed on the mark. (b) A cannon (which see). (c) The name of the game in which the third or red ball is used.

Carambole (ka-ram-bōl'), v.i. In billiards, to cannon.

Caramel (kar'a-mel), n. [Fr. caramel, caramel; Sp. caramelo, a lozenge—Ar. kora, a ball, and mochalla, a sweetmeat.] Anhydrous or burnt sugar, a product of the action of heat upon sugar. When cane-sugar is heated in an oil or metal bath to between 210° and 220° C., it begins to assume a brown colour of continually increasing depth, and when the tumefaction has ceased the vessel contains a black substance to which the name of caramel has been given. It has a high lustre, like anthracite, and dissolves readily in water, giving it a fine sepia tint. Its composition is the same as cane-sugar in its compound with oxide of lead. It is used for giving a brown colour to spirits. Written also, but less frequently Caromel.

Caramote (kar'a-mōt), n. [Fr.] A rather large species of shrimp (Penæus caramote) common in the Mediterranean, where it is caught in great numbers and salted for exportation.

Carana, Caranna (ka-ran'a), n. See CARAUNA.

Caranx (kā'rangks), n. A genus of acanthopterygian fishes, family Scomberidæ. One species (C. Trachurus) on the British coast is well known by the name of scad or horse-mackerel.

Carapa (ka-rä'pä), n. [From caraipe, the native name of the Guiana species.] A genus of tropical plants, nat. order Meliaceæ. A South American species, C. guianensis, is a fine large tree, whose bark is in repute as a febrifuge. Oil made from its seeds (called carap-oil or crab-oil) is used for lamps, and masts of ships are made from its trunk. The wood is called crab-wood. The oil of the African species, C. guineensis, called Coondi, Kundah, or Tallicoona oil, is used by the negroes for making soap and anointing their bodies, its taste being so bitter that it serves as a defence against bites of reptiles. The oil of the South American carapa is used for the same purpose also.

Carapace (kar'a-pās), n. [Fr., from Catalan Sp. carabassa, a gourd. See CALABASH.] The shell which protects the body of chelonian reptiles, as the tortoise or turtle. The term is also applied to the covering of the anterior superior surface of the crustaceans.

Carapax (kar'a-paks), n. Same as Carapace.

Carap-oil (kar'ap-oil), n. Oil obtained from Carapa guianensis. See CARAPA.

Carat (kar'at), n. [Fr. carat, Ar. qirrât, a shell of a bean, a pea, a pod; also a weight of 4 grains, a carat, borrowed from Gr. keration, lit. a little horn, also the fruit or seed of the carob-tree, used for a weight, a carat.] 1. The weight of 4 grains, used by goldsmiths and jewellers in weighing precious stones and pearls.—2. A term used to express the proportionate fineness of gold. The whole mass of gold is divided into twenty-four equal parts, and it is called gold of so many carats as it contains twenty-fourth parts of pure metal. Thus if a mass contain twenty-two parts of pure gold out of every twenty-four it is gold of twenty-two carats.

Carauna (ka-ra'na), n. [Native name.] A resin produced by the tree Bursera acuminata, and imported from tropical America. It is brought home in little masses, rolled up in leaves of flags. It has an agreeable aromatic smell, and a bitterish slightly pungent taste. It was formerly used in plasters. Called also Carana, Caranna.

Caravan (kar'a-van), n. [From Fr. caravane, from Sp. caravana, Ar. qairawân, Per. kārwân, a caravan.] 1. A company of travellers, pilgrims, or merchants, who associate together in many parts of Asia and Africa that they may travel with greater security, especially through deserts or regions infested by robbers. 'Men who pass in troop or caravan.' Milton.—2. A large close carriage on springs for conveying travelling exhibitions from place to place; a covered travelling cart without springs.

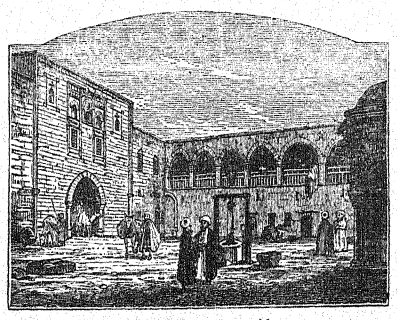
> He had never seen such a fat boy in or out of a travelling caravan. Dickens.

3.† A number of vessels or barks in company.—4.† An expedition with such vessels.

> Their galleys still spread over the Levant and came back victorious from their caravans, as their cruises against the Moslems were called. Prescott.

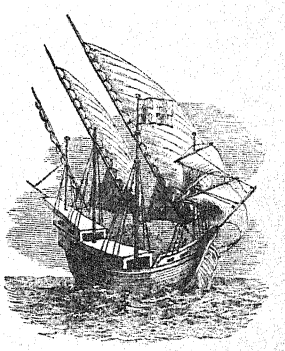
Caravaneer (kar'a-van-ēr'), n. The person who leads the camels, &c., of a caravan.

Caravansary, Caravansera (kar-a-van'-sa-ri, kar-a-van'se-ra), n. [Per. kārwân, a caravan, and sarâi, an inn.] In the East, a place appointed for receiving and lodging caravans; a kind of inn where the caravans rest at night, being a large square building, with a spacious court in the middle. Though caravansaries in the East serve in place of inns, there is this radical difference between them that, generally speaking, the traveller finds nothing in a caravansary for the use either of himself or his cattle. He must carry all his provisions and necessaries along with him. Those built in towns serve not only as inns, but contain shops, warehouses, and even exchanges.



Interior of Caravansary at Aleppo.

Caravel, Carvel (kar'a-vel, kär'vel), n. [Sp. and It. caravela, a caravel, dim. of L. carabus, Gr. karabos, a light ship, a boat, also a crab.] Naut. the name of different kinds of vessels. One variety used in Portugal is a vessel of 100 to 150 tons burden, another is a fishing vessel of 10 to 15 tons, and a third a large Turkish ship of war.



Caravel of the fifteenth century.

The name was also given to a small ship used by the Spaniards and Portuguese in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries for long voyages. It was narrow at the poop, wide at the bow, and carried a double tower at its stern and a single one at its bows. It had four masts and a bowsprit, and the principal sails were lateen sails. It was in command of three such caravels that Columbus crossed the Atlantic and discovered America.

Caraway (kar'a-wā), n. [Sp. al-carahueya, from Ar. karwiyâ, karawiyâ, caraway; probably from Gr. karon, L. carum, caraway. See CARVY.] 1. Carum Carui, nat. order Umbelliferæ, a biennial plant, with a taper root like a parsnip, which, when young, is used like carrots or parsnips, but it has a strong flavour. The seeds, which are properly the fruit, have an aromatic smell and a warm pungent taste. They are used to flavour cakes, also in comfits, and the volatile oil is obtained by distilling them in spirits.—2. A kind of sweetmeat containing caraway seeds. Shak.—3. A kind of apple. Mason.

Caraway-comfit (kar'a-wā-kum'fit), n. A sweetmeat containing caraway.

Carbamide (kär'ba-mīd), n. [Carbon and amide.] A compound having the formula CH_4N_2O. It is obtained by the action of ammonia on oxychloride of carbon. This substance seems to be identical with urea.

Carbazotate (kär-baz'ō-tāt), n. A salt formed by the union of carbazotic acid with a base.

Carbazotic Acid (kär-ba-zot'ik as'id), n. ($C_6H_3N_3O_7$.) [Carbon and azote.] A crystallizable acid and bitter substance, obtained by the action of nitric acid on indigo and some other animal and vegetable substances. It is of great importance in dyeing. When silk, which has been treated with a mordant of alum or cream of tartar, is immersed in a solution of this acid, it is dyed of a beautiful permanent yellow colour. Often called Picric Acid.

Carbide (kär'bīd), n. A compound of carbon with a metal, the usual effect of which is to render it hard and brittle. Formerly called Carburet.

Carbine, n. See CARABINE.

Carbineer (kär-bin-ēr'), n. See CARABINEER.

Carbohydrate (kär'bō-hī-drāt), n. [Carbon and hydrate.] An organic compound containing carbon and the elements of water, such as starch and cellulose. Ure.

Carbo-hydrogen (kär'bō-hī-drō-jen), n. Same as Hydro-carbon.

Carbolic Acid (kär-bol'ik as'id), n. [Carbon and oil.] (C_6H_6O.) An acid found in that part of the oil of coal which boils between 300° and 400°. It is, when pure, a colourless crystalline substance, but it is usually found as an oily liquid, colourless, with a burning taste and the odour of creosote. Carbolic acid is now much employed as a therapeutic and disinfectant. It may be taken internally in cases in which creosote is indicated; but its principal use is as an external application to unhealthy sores, compound fractures, and to abscesses after they have been opened, over which it coagulates, forming a crust impermeable to air and to the organic germs floating in the atmosphere, which produce decomposition in the wound. The action of the acid is not only to exclude these germs but also to destroy such as may have been admitted, for which reason it is introduced into the interior of the wound. Called also Phenic Acid.

Carbon (kär'bon), n. [L. carbo, a coal.] Sym. C. At. wt. 12. Pure charcoal; a simple body, black, brittle, light, and inodorous. It is usually the remains of some vegetable body from which all the volatile matter has been expelled by heat; but it may be obtained from most organic matters, animal as well as vegetable, by ignition in close vessels. When crystallized it forms the diamond. Wood carbon, or charcoal well prepared, is of a deep black colour, brittle and porous, tasteless and inodorous. It is infusible in any heat a furnace can raise, but by the action of a powerful galvanic apparatus it may be volatilized, presenting a surface with a distinct appearance of having undergone fusion. When thoroughly burned it is a conductor of electricity, but a very bad conductor of heat. It has the property of absorbing different gases, and gives them out again when heated. It has a powerful affinity for oxygen, and decomposes several of the acids, depriving them of their oxygen. It is used sometimes as fuel on account of its giving a strong and steady heat without smoke. It is employed to convert iron into steel by cementation. It enters into the composition of gunpowder. It forms the basis of black paints, Indian ink, and printers' ink. Carbon is one of those elements which exist in various distinct forms called allotropic forms. It occurs as diamond, wood charcoal, animal charcoal, graphite, lamp-black, and anthracite. The compounds of this element are more numerous than those of all the other elements taken together.—Carbon points, in electric lighting, two pieces of very hard, compact carbon, between which the electric circuit is broken, so that the resistance which they offer to the passage of the current produces a light of extraordinary brilliancy.—Carbon printing, in photog. a process by which permanent pictures, &c., are printed from photographic negatives. The surface of the paper to be submitted to the light under the negative is coated with gelatine, starch, or gum, combined with carbon or any other pigment, and exposed to the varying intensities of light passing through the negative, the result being that the gelatine becomes insoluble to proportional depths. The soluble gelatine is then washed away with hot water, when a permanent positive print is developed.

Carbonaceous (kär-bo-nā'shus), a. Pertaining to carbon or charcoal. See CARBONIC.—Carbonaceous rocks are such as contain decomposed animal or vegetable matter, chiefly the latter, in such quantity as to give the rock a dark tint.

Carbonade,† Carbonado† (kär'bo-nād, kär-bo-nā'dō), n. [From L. carbo, a coal.] In cookery, a piece of meat, fowl, or game, cut across, seasoned, and broiled; a chop.

> If I come in his (way) willingly let him make a carbonado of me. Shak.

Carbonade,† Carbonado† (kär'bo-nād, kär-bo-nā'dō), v.t. pret. & pp. carbonaded; ppr. carbonading. 1. To cut or hack for broiling or frying. 'A hare daintily carbonadoed.' Beau. & Fl.—2. To cut or hack, as in fighting.

> Draw, you rogue, or I'll so carbonade your shanks. Shak.

Carbonaro (kär-bō-nä'rō), n. pl. Carbonari (kär-bō-nä'rē). [It., lit. a coal-man, a charcoal-burner.] A name given to the members of a secret political society, which appears to have been formed by the Neapolitan republicans during Murat's government, and had for its object the expulsion of the stranger and the establishment of a democratic government. Towards 1818 the society spread into France.

Carbonate (kär'bon-āt), n. In chem. a compound formed by the union of carbonic acid with a base; as, carbonate of lime; carbonate of copper. The carbonates are an important class of salts, many of them being extensively used in the arts and in medicine.

Carbonated (kär'bon-āt-ed), a. Containing carbonic acid.—Carbonated springs, springs of water impregnated with carbonic acid gas. They are common in volcanic countries.

Carbonic (kär-bon'ik), a. Pertaining to carbon, or obtained from it.—Carbonic acid (CO_2), more properly called Carbonic Anhydride, or Carbon Dioxide, a gaseous compound of 12 parts by weight of carbon and 32 of oxygen, colourless, without smell, twenty-two times as heavy as hydrogen, turning blue litmus slightly red, and existing in the atmosphere to the extent of 1 volume in 2500. It is incapable of maintaining flame or animal life, acting as a narcotic poison when present in the air to the extent of only 4 or 5 per cent. It is disengaged from fermenting liquors and from decomposing vegetable and animal substances, and is largely evolved from fissures in the earth, constituting the choke-damp of mines. From its weight it has a tendency to subside into low places, vaults and wells, rendering some low-lying places, as the upas valley of Java, and many caves, uninhabitable. It has a pleasant, acidulous, pungent taste, and aerated beverages of all kinds—beer, champagne, and carbonated mineral water—owe their refreshing qualities to its presence, for though poisonous when taken into the lungs, it is agreeable when taken into the stomach. This acid is formed and given out during the respiration of animals, and in all ordinary combustions, from the oxidation of carbon in the fuel. It exists in large quantity in all limestones and marbles. It is evolved from the coloured parts of the flowers of plants both by night and day, and from the green parts of plants during the night. During the day plants absorb it from the atmosphere through their leaves, and it forms an important part of their nourishment.—Carbonic or carbonous oxide (CO), a substance obtained by transmitting carbonic acid over red-hot fragments of charcoal, contained in a tube of iron or porcelain, and also by several other processes. It is a colourless, inodorous gas, sp. gr. 0·9727, has neither acid nor alkaline properties, is very poisonous, and burns with a pale lavender flame. This substance is produced when a coal fire burns with a smokeless flame. The pale lavender flame of burning carbonic oxide may often be observed playing over the surface of such a fire.

Carboniferous (kär-bo-nif'ėr-us), a. [L. carbo, carbonis, a coal, and fero, to bear.] Containing or yielding carbon or coal.—Carboniferous system, in geol. the great group of strata which lie between the old red sandstone below and the Permian or new red sandstone above. They derive their designation from the amount of carbon contained in them. They include the coal-measures, millstone grit, and mountain limestone.

Carbonization (kär'bon-iz-ā''shon), n. The act or process of carbonizing.

Carbonize (kär'bon-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. carbonized; ppr. carbonizing. To convert into carbon by combustion, or the action of fire.

Carbonohydrous (kär''bon-ō-hī'drus), a. Composed of carbon and hydrogen.

Carbonometer (kär-bo-nom'et-ėr), n. An instrument to detect the presence of an excess of carbonic acid by its action on lime-water.

Carbonous (kär'bon-us), a. Pertaining to or containing carbon.—Carbonous oxide, same as Carbonic Oxide (which see under CARBONIC).

Carbon-point (kär'bon-point), n. See under CARBON.

Carbon-printing (kär'bon-print-ing), n. See under CARBON.

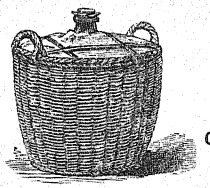
Carbon-spar (kär'bon-spär), n. A name given to several mineral carbonates, as carbonate of magnesium, of zinc, &c.

Carbovinate of Potassium (kar-bov'i-nāt), n. More properly Ethyl-carbonate of Potassium ($C_2H_5K.CO_3$). A white crystalline ether obtained by the action of carbon dioxide upon perfectly dry hydrate of potassium in absolute alcohol.

Carboy (kär'boi), n. [Per. karabá, large vessels for containing wine.] A large globular bottle of green glass, protected by an outside covering, and used chiefly for containing certain acids (such as vitriol or sulphuric acid) and other highly corrosive liquids likely to act upon stoneware.



Carboy.

Carbuncle (kär'bung-kl), n. [L. carbunculus, a little coal, from carbo, a coal.] 1. A beautiful gem of a deep red colour, with a mixture of scarlet, called by the Greeks anthrax, found in the East Indies. It is found pure, and adhering to a heavy ferruginous stone of the emery kind. It is usually a quarter of an inch in length, and two-thirds of that in diameter, of an angular figure. When held up to the sun it loses its deep tinge, and becomes exactly of the colour of a burning coal. The carbuncle of the ancients is supposed to have been a garnet.—2. An inflammatory tumour, or malignant gangrenous boil or ulcer, differing from a boil in having no central core; an anthrax.

> It was a pestilent fever, but there followed no carbuncle. Bacon.

3. In her. a charge or bearing, generally consisting of eight radii, four of which make a common cross, and the other four a saltier; sometimes the number of rays is only six, and sometimes as many as twelve. Called also Escarbuncle.

Carbuncled (kär'bung-kld), a. 1. Set with carbuncles. 'Armour . . . carbuncled like holy Phœbus' car.' Shak.—2. Afflicted with the malignant boil called carbuncle; pimpled and blotched. 'A carbuncled face.' Brome.

Carbuncular (kär-bung'kū-lėr), a. Belonging to a carbuncle; resembling a carbuncle; red; inflamed.

Carbunculate (kär-bung'kū-lāt), a. Same as Carbuncular.

Carbunculation (kär-bung'kū-lā''shon), n. [L. carbunculatio, from carbunculo, to burn to a coal, to blast. See CARBUNCLE.] The blasting of the young buds of trees or plants by excessive heat or cold.

Carburet (kär'bū-ret), n. The old name for Carbide (which see).

Carburetted (kär'bū-ret-ed), a. Combined with carbon in the manner of a carburet; as, carburetted hydrogen.—Light carburetted hydrogen, a compound of carbon and hydrogen (CH_4), which occurs in coal-mines (fire-damp) and about the neighbourhood of stagnant pools.

Carcajou (kär'ka-jö), n. [Fr. carcajou, from native name.] A species of badger found in Canada and other parts of North America, the Meles (Taxidea) labradorica.

Carcanet (kär'ka-net), n. [Fr. carcan, formerly also carchant, a carcanet, an iron collar, probably from Armor. kerchen, the neck or bosom. Diez derives it from O.H.G. querca, Icel. kverk, the throat.] 1. A necklace or collar of jewels. 'Jewels in the carcanet.' Shak.

> About thy neck a carcanet is bound,
> Made of the rubie, pearl, and diamond. Herrick.

2.† A cluster of jewels or pendent ornaments for the hair. 'Curled hairs hung full of sparkling carcanets.' Marston.

Carcara (kär-kä'ra), n. Same as Caracara.

Carcass, Carcase (kär'kas), n. [O.E. carcays, carkeys, from O.Fr. carquasse, Fr. carcasse, the carcass, a framework, a kind of bomb, ultimately the same word as carquois, a quiver, from L.L. tarcasius, a quiver, and that from Ar. and Per. tarkash, terkesh, a quiver. From the sense of case for arrows the word would come to have the meaning of case or shell in general, hence its application to the body.] 1. The body, usually the dead body, of an animal; a corpse. It is not usually applied to the living body of the human species, except in low or ludicrous language, or in contempt. 'To pamper his own carcass.' South.—2. The decaying remains of a bulky thing, as of a boat or ship. 'The carcasses of many a tall ship.' Shak.—3. The frame or main parts of a thing unfinished, or without ornament, as the timber work of a house before it is lathed or plastered or the floors laid, or the keel, ribs, &c., of a ship.—4. An iron case, shell, or hollow vessel, filled with combustible and other substances, as gunpowder, saltpetre, sulphur, broken glass, turpentine, &c., thrown from a mortar or howitzer, and intended to set fire to buildings, ships, and wooden defences. It has two or three apertures, from which the fire blazes, and the light sometimes serves as a direction in throwing shells. It is sometimes equipped with pistol barrels loaded with powder to the muzzle, which explode as the composition burns down to them.—Carcass flooring, in arch. the grated frame of timber-work which supports the boarding or floor-boards above and the ceiling below.—Carcass roofing, the grated frame of timber-work which spans the building, and carries the boarding and other covering.

Carcass.

Carcavelhos (kär-ka-vāl'yōs), n. A sweet wine, grown in the district of this name in Portugal. Commoner forms in England are Calcavella and Calcavellos.

Carcelage† (kär'se-lāj), n. [L.L. carcelagium, carceragium, from L. carcer, a prison.] Prison fees.

Carcerule (kär'sér-ūl), n. [Dim. from L. carcer, a prison.] In bot. (a) same as Sarcobasis (which see). (b) The spore-case of a fungus.

Carcharias (kär-kā'ri-as), n. [Gr. karcharias, a kind of shark having jagged teeth, from karcharos, jagged.] A genus of elasmobranchiate fishes, whose teeth exhibit a reticulated structure of medullary tubes, comprising some of the most voracious of the sharks; for example, the white shark (C. vulgaris), which sometimes attains the length of 25 to 30 feet, its mouth being sufficiently wide to enable it to receive the thigh or even the body of a man.

Carcharidæ (kär-kar'i-dē), n. pl. [See CARCHARIAS.] A name given by some zoologists to the Squalidæ or shark family.

Carcharodon (kär'kar-ō-don), n. [Gr. karcharos, jagged, and odous, odontis, a tooth.] A genus of fossil tertiary sharks, often of great size, differing from the species of the living genus Carcharias chiefly in their teeth being solid in the centre, while in the latter they are hollow.

Carcinological (kär'sin-ō-loj''ik-al), a. Pertaining to carcinology.

Carcinology (kär-sin-ol'o-ji), n. [Gr. karkinos, a crab, and logos, discourse.] That department of zoology which interests itself with crustaceans, or crabs, shrimps, &c. Called also Crustaceology and Malacostracology.

Carcinoma (kär-si-nō'ma), n. [Gr. karkinōma, from karkinoō, karkinos, a cancer.] A cancer. This is the sense in which the word is generally used by medical writers; but some apply it to an indolent tumour different from cancer, while others confine it to an incipient cancer, and others to that kind of cancer in which the affected structure assumes the appearance of cerebral substance.

Carcinomatous (kär-si-nō'ma-tus), a. Pertaining to carcinoma; cancerous; like a cancer, or tending to it.

Carcinus (kär'si-nus), n. [Gr. karkinos, a crab.] A genus of decapod crustacea, containing the most common crab on our coast, the green-crab or shore-crab (C. mœnas).

Card (kärd), n. [Corrupted from Fr. carte, a card, from L. charta, paper, from Gr. chartē, chartēs, a separated layer of the papyrus bark.] 1. A piece of thick paper or pasteboard prepared for various purposes; (a) a piece of cardboard on which are painted figures or points; a playing card in games. (b) A piece of cardboard with one's name, &c., written or printed on it, used in visiting, and generally for indicating the name of the person presenting it. Called also Visiting Card. (c) The paper on which the points of the compass are marked. 'Reason the card, but passion is the gale.' Pope. (d) A piece of pasteboard on which is written or printed an invitation to a public or private entertainment.—2. Same as Business Card (which see under BUSINESS): an extension of the sense 1 (b).—3. A slang term applied to an eccentric person, or any one who has some notable peculiarity, such as one who is very fast; a character. 'Such an old card as this, so deep, so sly.' Dickens.

Card† (kärd), v.i. To play at cards. Johnson.

Card (kärd), n. [Fr. carde, a card for wool, from L.L. cardus, L. carduus, a thistle, from carere, to card—thistles having been used as cards.] An instrument for combing, opening, and breaking wool or flax, freeing it from the coarser parts and from extraneous matter. It is made by inserting bent teeth of wire in a thick piece of leather, and nailing this to a piece of oblong board to which a handle is attached. But wool and cotton are now generally carded in mills by teeth fixed on a wheel moved by machinery.

Card (kärd), v.t. or i. 1. To comb or open wool, flax, hemp, &c., with a card for the purpose of cleansing it of extraneous matter, separating the coarser parts, and making it fine and soft for spinning.

Go card and spin,
And leave the business of the war to men.
Dryden.

Fig.

This book must be carded and purged. Skelton.

2.† To mingle; to mix; to weaken or debase by mixing.

You card your beer, if you see your guests begin to be drunk, half small, half strong. Greene.

Cardamine (kär-dam'i-nē), n. [Gr. kardaminē, a kind of cress.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferæ. The species are numerous, and are annual or perennial herbs, with usually pinnate leaves and racemes of white or purple flowers. C. pratensis (cuckoo-flower or ladies'-smock) is abundant in Britain. It has a bitter taste, and at one time it had the reputation of being a diuretic and antispasmodic. It is known to possess antiscorbutic properties. It is generally in blossom when the cuckoo returns to this country, hence the name cuckoo-flower. Four other species are described as natives of Britain, viz. C. amara (bitter-cress), C. impatiens, C. hirsuta, and C. sylvatica.

Cardamom (kär'da-mum), n. [L. cardamomum, Gr. kardamōmon.] The aromatic capsule of different species of Amomum and Elettaria, nat. order Zingiberaceæ, employed in medicine as well as an ingredient in sauces and curries. The cardamoms known in the shops are the large, supposed to be produced by A. angustifolium, a Madagascar plant; the middle-sized and the small, both supposed to be the produce of A. Cardamomum, a native of Sumatra and other eastern islands. Those recognized in the British pharmacopœia called true or officinal cardamoms and known in commerce as Malabar cardamoms, are the produce of Elettaria (Alpinia) Cardamomum, a native of the mountains of Malabar and Canara. Ceylon cardamoms are the fruit of A. grana-paradisi.

Card-basket (kärd'bas-ket), n. An ornamental basket for holding visiting cards.

Cardboard (kärd'bōrd), n. A stiff kind of paper or pasteboard for making cards, &c.; pasteboard.

Card-case (kärd'kās), n. A small pocket case, generally of an ornamental kind, for holding visiting cards.

Cardecu† (kär'dē-kū), n. [Corrupt for Fr. quart d'écu.] The fourth part of a crown.

A set of hilding fellows, . . . the bunch of them were not worth a cardecu. Sir W. Scott.

Carder (kärd'ér), n. One who cards wool; the machine employed in carding wool. 'The spinsters, carders, fullers, weavers.' Shak.

Carder (kärd'ér), n. One who plays at cards; a gamester. 'Coggers, carders, dicers.' Bp. Woolton.

Cardia (kär'di-a), n. [Gr. kardia, the heart.] In anat. the upper orifice of the stomach where the œsophagus enters it.

Cardiac (kär'di-ak), a. [L. cardiacus, Gr. kardiakos, from kardia, the heart.] 1. Pertaining to the heart.—2. Exciting action in the heart through the medium of the stomach; having the quality of stimulating action in the system, invigorating the spirits, and giving strength and cheerfulness.—The cardiac orifice of the stomach, the cardia.—Cardiac passion, an old name for heart-burn.—Cardiac arteries and veins, the coronary arteries and veins of the heart.—Cardiac wheel, in mech. a heart-wheel; a cam-wheel in the form of a heart. See HEART-CAM.

Cardiac (kär'di-ak), n. A medicine which excites action in the stomach and animates the spirits; a cordial.

Cardiacal (kär-dī'ak-al), a. Same as Cardiac.

Cardiace† (kär'di-ās), n. [Gr. kardia, the heart.] A heart-shaped precious stone. Crabb.

Cardiaceæ (kär-di-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. Same as Cardiadæ.

Cardiadæ (kär-dī'a-dē), n. pl. [From Cardium, one of the genera.] A family of lamellibranchiate molluscs, including the cockles and their allies. They have equivalve bivalve convex shells, having prominent umbones or beaks curved towards the hinge, which, when viewed sideways, give them the appearance of a heart. The mantle edges are united so as to form two orifices or short siphons, through which water passes out and in, serving for respiration and nutrition.

Carya (kā'ri-a), n. [Gr. karya, a walnut-tree, akin to karyon, a nut, a walnut.] A genus of North American trees, belonging to the walnut family (Juglandaceæ), and comprehending the various trees well known as hickory. See HICKORY.

Caryatid, from British Museum.

Caryatic (kar-i-at'ik), a. Pertaining to the Caryans or to caryatids. 'Persian and Caryatic figures.' R. Stuart.—Caryatic order, in arch. an order in which the entablature is supported by female figures instead of columns.

Caryatid (kar-i-at'id), n. pl. Caryatids, Caryatides (kar-i-at'idz, kar-i-at'i-dēz). [Perhaps from Caryæ, a city in the Peloponnesus.] In arch. a figure of a woman dressed in long robes, serving to support entablatures. Vitruvius relates that the city Caryæ sided with the Persians after the battle of Thermopylæ, and that it was on that account sacked by the other Greeks, who took their wives captive, and to perpetuate this event erected trophies in which figures of women dressed in the Caryatic manner were used to support entablatures. This story is, however, believed to be unworthy of credit, although it seems to be not improbable that the idea and name of the Caryatids were derived from this city.

Caryocar (kar'i-ō-kär), n. [Gr. karyon, a nut.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rhizobolaceæ, consisting of ten species of lofty trees, natives of tropical America. They produce good timber, and their fruits contain three or four large kidney-shaped seeds inclosed in an extremely hard woody shell, reddish-brown in colour and covered with roundish protuberances. They are called souari or butter-nuts, have a pleasant nutty flavour, and yield a bland oil. The C. nuciferum is the chief source of these nuts, a tree frequently reaching the height of 100 feet, and common in the forests of British Guiana, where it grows particularly on the banks of the rivers Essequibo and Berbice. Its flowers are large and of a deep purplish-red colour.

Caryocatactes (kar'i-ō-ka-tak''tēz), n. [Gr. karyon, a nut, and katakteinō, to kill.] The name given by Cuvier to the genus now usually called Nucifraga, comprising the nut-crackers.

Caryophyllaceæ (kar'i-ō-fil-lā''sē-ē), n. pl. [From Caryophyllum, the latinized form of the Greek name of an Indian tree, probably the clove-tree, but given by Endlicher to the genus Dianthus of Linnæus, the typical genus of this order. See CARYOPHYLLUS.] The pink tribe, a nat. order of plants, consisting of more than a thousand species of bland herbs, with stems generally swollen at the nodes, and opposite leaves, the bases of which are frequently united. The flowers are regular, and the numerous seeds are attached to a central placenta. The great proportion of the species are inconspicuous weeds, like chick-weed, spurrey, sandwort, &c., but many are found as favourite plants in our gardens, as the pink, carnation, sweet-william, &c.

Caryophyllaceous (kar'i-ō-fil-lā''shus), a. Pertaining to the Caryophyllaceæ: especially applied to flowers having five petals with long claws in a tubular calyx.

Caryophylline (kar-i-of'il-lin or kar-i-ō-fil'-lin), n. [See CARYOPHYLLUS.] A crystalline substance obtained from cloves by treating them with alcohol.

Caryophyllous, Caryophylleous (kar-i-ō-fil'us, kar-i-ō-fil'ē-us), a. Same as Caryophyllaceous.

Caryophyllus (kar-i-of'il-lus or kar-i-ō-fil'-lus), n. [Gr. karyophyllon, the clove-tree—karyon, a nut, and phyllon, a leaf.] A genus of plants, nat. order Myrtaceæ, by some authors included in Eugenia. It is the genus to which the clove-tree belongs. See CLOVE.

Caryopsis (kar-i-op'sis), n. [Gr. karyon, a nut, and opsis, an appearance.] In bot. a small, one-seeded, dry, indehiscent fruit, in which the seed adheres to the thin pericarp throughout, so that the fruit and seed are incorporated into one body, as in wheat and other kinds of grain.

Caryota (kar-i-ō'ta), n. [Gr. karyōtos, nut-like, from karyon, a nut.] A genus of palms, with doubly pinnate leaves and wedge-shaped leaflets, strongly toothed at the extremity. The best known species (C. urens) is a native of most of tropical Asia; it supplies an inferior kind of sago, and from its juice is made toddy or palm-wine. The outside of the stem supplies a hard and durable wood.

Cas,† n. [Fr., from L. casus, chance.] Chance; hap; fortune; case; misfortune. Chaucer; Piers Plowman.

Ca. Sa. (kā sā). In law, the usual abbreviation of capias ad satisfaciendum. See CAPIAS.

Casal (kā'sal), a. In gram. of or belonging to case.

The casal termination of the Saxon possessive is es or as, as appears in such phrases as 'Godes sight,' 'kinges crown.' J. M. M'Culloch.

Casava, Casave (ka-sā'va, ka-sā've), n. Same as Cassava.

Cascabel (kas'ka-bel), n. [Sp. cascabel, a little bell, a button or knob at the end of a cannon, from L. scabellum, a sort of castanet.] The rear part of a cannon; the part which is behind the base ring, and includes the base and knob.

Cascade (kas-kād'), n. [Fr. cascade, It. cascata, from cascare, to fall, from L. cado, casum, to fall.] A steep fall or flowing of water over a precipice in a river or other stream; a waterfall, whether natural or artificial.

The river Teverone throws itself down a precipice, and falls by several cascades from one rock to another. Addison.

Cascade (kas-kād'), v.i. To vomit. [Provincial and colloq.]

Cascalho (kas-kal'yo), n. The name given in Brazil to the auriferous or gold-bearing alluvial deposit of the country. It is also the principal repository of the diamond.

The common cascalho is an indurated soil, in which gold is contained, and seems to consist of the fragments of veins which have by some means been broken up, rolled about by the action of water, and buried by it among the clays which have composed it. Ansted.

Cascarilla (kas-ka-ril'la), n. [Sp. dim. of cascara, peel, bark.] The aromatic bitter bark of Croton Eleutheria, a small tree of the nat. order Cinchonaceæ, and closely allied to Cinchona, cultivated chiefly in Eleuthera, one of the Bahamas. This bark is imported in small thin fragments and brittle rolls like quills, and is sometimes employed as a substitute for cinchona, but is inferior in tonic and febrifuge qualities.

Casco (kas'kō), n. A boat of the Philippines, used chiefly on the river at Manilla. It is almost of rectangular form, very flat, and very durable, and is much used at Manilla for conveying cargo to and from ships.

Case (kās), n. [O.Fr. casse (now caisse), from L. capsa, a repository, chest, box, from capio, to take, receive, contain. Cash is really the same word.] 1. A covering, box, or sheath; that which incloses or contains; as, a case for knives; a case for books; a watch case; a pillow case.—2.† The skin of an animal.

Generally, as with rich-furred conies, their cases are far better than their bodies. Burton.

3. The exterior portion of a building; an outer coating for walls.

The case of the holy house is nobly designed and executed by great masters. Addison.

4. A box and its contents; hence, a quantity, either (a) an indefinite quantity, in which sense Shakspere speaks of a case of lives ('The knocks are too hot; and for mine own part, I have not a case of lives'); or sometimes (b) a definite quantity, as, among glaziers, 225 square feet of crown glass; also, 125 feet of Newcastle or Normandy glass.—5. In printing, the receptacle for the types, from which the compositor gathers them separately and arranges them in lines and pages to print from. There are two cases, an upper and a lower, which are divided into a number of compartments or boxes for holding a supply of the different letters. The upper case contains the capitals and accented and dotted letters; the lower contains the small letters, spaces, &c.—6. Milit. same as Case-shot.—7. In mining, a small fissure which lets water into the workings.—Case of a door, the wooden frame in which a door is hung.—Case of a stair, the wall surrounding a staircase.

Case (kās), v.t. pret. & pp. cased; ppr. casing. 1. To cover with a case; to surround with any material that shall inclose or defend. 'Case ye; on with your vizards.' Shak. Specifically, (a) in arch. to face or cover (the outside wall of a building) with material of a better quality than that of the wall itself. (b) In plastering, to plaster (as a house) with mortar on the outside, and strike a ruler laid on it while moist with the edge of a trowel, so as to mark it with lines resembling the joints of freestone.—2. To put in a case or box.—3.† To remove the case or skin of; to uncase; to skin.

We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him. Shak.

See phrase, 'First catch your hare,' &c., under CATCH.

Case (kās), n. [L. casus, a falling, from cado, casum, to fall.] 1. Lit. that which falls, comes, or happens; an event; hence, the particular state, condition, or circumstances that befall a person, or in which he is placed; as, make the case your own; in good case. 'Pity my case.' Shak.

E. break in sense of cashier. See CASHIER, v.t.] To cashier; to discard.

Cashing the greatest part of his land army, he only retained 2000 of the best soldiers. Sir A. Gorges.

Cash-account (kash'ak-kount), n. 1. An account of money received, paid, or on hand.—2. In banking, a credit given by a bank to an amount agreed upon to any individual or house of business that can procure two or more persons of undoubted credit or property to become surety for the repayment, on demand, of the sum credited, with interest. Persons having such accounts draw upon them for whatever sums within their amount they have occasion for, repaying these advances as they find opportunity, but generally within short periods. Interest is charged only on the average balance which may be due to the bank. Called also Bank-credit, cash-account being more especially a Scotch name. The system of granting such credits seems to have been initiated by the Scotch banks.

Cash-book (kash'bụk), n. A book in which is kept a register or account of money received and paid.

Cash-credit (kash'kred-it), n. A cash-account, or a credit granted on it by a bank.

Cash-day (kash'dā), n. A day on which cash is regularly paid; a pay-day.

Cashew (ka-shō'), n. [From cassu, caju, or acaju, native names for the edible stalk or receptacle of the cashew-nut.] 1. The popular name for Anacardium occidentale (the cashew-tree). See ANACARDIUM.—2. Same as Cachou.

Cashew-bird (ka-shō'bėrd), n. The name given in Jamaica to one of the tanagers (Tanagra zena), an insessorial bird of the dentirostral group. It feeds on the berries of the bully-tree.

Cashew-nut (ka-shō'nut), n. The fruit of the cashew-tree (Anacardium occidentale). The ash-coloured fruit is kidney-shaped, and consists of a kernel inclosed in a very hard shell. The shell is composed of three layers, the outer and inner of which are hard, while the intermediate contains a quantity of black, acrid, caustic oil which excoriates the lips and tongue of any who try to crack the nut with their teeth. It is rendered harmless by roasting, and the fumes given off in the roasting are so acrid as to produce inflammation. The kernel abounds with a sweet, milky juice, and forms an ingredient in puddings, &c. It is put into Madeira wine to give it a flavour, and with this view is sometimes imported into Britain. The stalk or receptacle of the fruit is very large and fleshy, has an agreeable acid flavour, and is slightly astringent.

Anacardium occidentale. 1 1 1, Cashew-nuts.

Cashew-tree (ka-shō'trē), n. The tree that produces the cashew-nut. See above, and ANACARDIUM.

Cashiclaws (kash'i-kląz), n. An old Scotch instrument of torture, consisting of an iron case for the leg, to which fire was applied.

Cashier (kash-ēr'), n. [From cash; comp. Fr. caissier, a cashier.] One who has charge of cash or money; one who keeps an account of the monetary transactions of a bank or other commercial concern; a cash-keeper.

Cashier (kash-ēr'), v.t. [O.E. casseere, to cashier, from O.Fr. casser, to break, to cashier, through the G. cassiren. See CASH, to cashier.] 1. To dismiss from an office or place of trust by annulling the commission.

He had the insolence to cashier the captain of the lord-lieutenant's own body-guard. Macaulay.

2. To dismiss or discard from service or from society.

They have already cashiered several of their followers. Addison.

Cassareep, Cassireepe (kas'sa-rēp, kas'si-rēp), n. [Cassaripe, South American name.] The concentrated juice of the roots of the bitter cassava (Manihot utilissima), flavoured by aromatics and deprived of its poisonous properties by boiling. It is used to give a relish to soups and other dishes, and forms the basis of the West Indian 'pepper-pot.' Written also Cassaripe.

Cassate† (kas'sāt), v.t. [L. cassus, vain, empty. See CASHIER.] To vacate, annul, or make void.

This opinion supersedes and cassates the best medium we have. Ray.

Cassation (kas-sā'shon), n. The act of annulling or of reversing a judicial sentence. In France there is a court of cassation. It is the highest court of the country, and receives appeals from all other courts.

Cassava Plant (Manihot utilissima).

Cassava (kas-sā'va or kas-sā'va), n. [Pg. cassave, Sp. casabe, cazabe, from Haytian name kasabi.] 1. A species of manihot (M. utilissima), nat. order Euphorbiaceæ. See MANIOC.—2. The nutritious starch obtained from the white soft root of the plant. It is prepared in the West Indies, tropical America, and on the African coast in the following manner:—The roots are washed, stripped of their rind, and grated down to a pulp, which is put into coarse, strong canvas bags, and submitted to powerful pressure to express the highly poisonous juice. The flour that remains after pressing is formed into thin round cakes, and baked on a hot iron plate. They are then allowed to cool, and afterwards broken into pieces and laid out in the sun to dry. In this state it forms a valuable article of food, upon which many of the inhabitants of southern America live almost entirely. From cassava the tapioca of commerce is prepared. See TAPIOCA.

Casse,† v.t. See CASS.

Casse-paper (kas'se-pā-pėr), n. The name given to the paper constituting the two outside quires of a ream; broken paper.

Cassetur breve (kas-sē'tėr brē'vē). [L., lit. let the brief be annulled.] In law, an entry made by a plaintiff, who finds a plea in abatement is well founded, whereby an end is put to the action, and he can begin anew.

Cassia (kash'i-a), n. [L. casia, Gr. kasia (rarely with double s), from the Hebrew or Phœnician name.] 1. A large genus of leguminous plants, inhabiting the tropical parts of the world. The species consist of trees, shrubs, or herbs; the leaves are abruptly pinnated, and usually bear glands on their stalks. The leaflets of several species constitute the well-known drug called senna. That imported from Alexandria is obtained from C. acutifolia and C. obovata. East Indian senna consists of the lance-shaped leaflets of C. elongata; and other species supply smaller quantities in commerce. C. Fistula is found wild in India, and has been introduced into other tropical countries. Its legumes contain a quantity of thick pulp, which is a mild laxative, and enters into the composition of the confection of cassia and the confection of senna. The leaves and flowers are also purgative.—2. Same as Cassia-lignea.

Cassia-bark (kash'i-a-bärk), n. Same as Cassia-lignea.

Cassia-bud (kash'i-a-bud), n. The flower-bud of Cinnamomum Cassia and other species of the same genus, used in cooking, &c.

Cassia-lignea (kash'i-a-lig-ne-a), n. [Lit. ligneous or woody cassia.] The bark of the same trees that yield cassia-buds. It is much prized by the Chinese and largely imported into Europe. Its flavour somewhat resembles that of cinnamon; and as it contains a greater portion of essential oil, and is much cheaper, it is now more extensively used.

Cassia-oil (kash'i-a-oil), n. The common oil of cinnamon, procured from cassia-bark and cassia-buds.

Cassia-pulp (kash'i-a-pulp), n. The sweet pulp which exists in the pods of Cassia Fistula. It is used in medicine as a mild purgative. See CASSIA.

Cassican (kas'si-kan), n. 1. An insessorial bird of the genus Cassicus (which see).—2. Sometimes improperly applied to the barita, an Australasian bird.

Cassicus (kas'si-kus), n. [Probably from L. casses, a net, a spider's web, from their woven nests.] An American genus of insessorial birds, family Icteridæ, allied to the starlings, remarkable for the ingenuity with which they weave their nests. The C. cristatus, sometimes called the crested oriole, is about 20 inches long, and constructs a pouch-shaped nest of the length of 30 inches, of thin shreds of bark, which, with the view of ensuring its safety from monkeys and serpents, it suspends at the extremity of the branch of some smooth-barked tree.

Caste (kast), n. [Fr. caste, from Pg. casta, breed, race, caste: said to have been first applied to the classes of the Hindus by the Portuguese, who were the earliest colonists of India. It is comparatively of late that the word has come to be spelled caste, being by old authors written cast.] 1. One of the tribes or classes into which the Hindus are divided according to the religious law of Brahmanism. These castes are four in number: 1st, the Brahmans, or the sacerdotal caste; 2d, the Kshatriyas, or military caste; 3d, the Vaisyas, or husbandmen and merchants; 4th, the Sudras, or labourers and mechanics. Men of no caste are called Parias and regarded as outcasts. In Sanskrit castes are called Varnas, colours, colour being, no doubt, the chief distinction at first. Besides the original castes numerous mixed classes or castes have sprung up in the progress of time, and are dependent upon a man's trade, occupation, or profession. The same term is also used of somewhat similar classes in other countries.—2. A rank or grade of society: especially used of the upper grades.

Her manner had not that repose
Which stamps the caste of Vere de Vere.
Tennyson.

He had returned to his own home when the ascendency of his own caste had been re-established; and he had been chosen to represent the University of Dublin in the House of Commons. Macaulay.

Castle (kas'l), n. [L. castellum, dim. of castrum, a fort.] 1. A building, or series of connected buildings, fortified for defence against an enemy; a fortified residence; a fortress. Castles, in the sense of fortified residences, were an outgrowth or institution of feudalism, and were first brought to a high pitch of strength and completeness by the Normans. In England there were few or no castles, properly speaking, till the time of William the Conqueror, after which a great many were constructed on the Norman model. At first the donjon or keep was the only part of the castle of great strength, and the other buildings in connection with it were more or less of a temporary nature. In the thirteenth century, however, the design of the castle became more fully developed, and the keep formed only the central part of a group of buildings, all supporting each other, and mutually contributing to the strength and commodiousness of the whole. The cut shows the castle of the Sires de Coucy, France, built in the thirteenth century. In the foreground is the outer bailey or esplanade, fortified, and containing a chapel, stables, and other buildings. The outer entrance to this was formed by the barbican. a is the fosse, 20 yards broad; b, the gateway, approached by two swing bridges, defended by two guard-rooms, and having a double portcullis within, giving entrance to vaulted guard-rooms with sleeping apartments, &c., above, c; d, inner bailey or courtyard; e, covered buildings for the men defending the walls or curtains; f, apartments for the family, entered by the grand staircase, g; h, great hall, with storerooms and vaults below; i, donjon or keep (the chapel is seen behind it), the strongest part of the castle, with walls of immense thickness, suited to form the last retreat of the garrison. At k was a postern leading from the donjon and communicating with an outer postern, drawbridge, &c.; l, m, n, o, towers or bastions flanking the walls.

Our castle's strength will laugh a siege to scorn. Shak.

A man's house is his castle. Sir E. Coke.

The house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for defence against injury and violence as for his repose. Sir E. Coke.

Castor-oil (kas'tėr-oil), n. [Probably from some resemblance to the substance castor.] The oil obtained from the seeds of Ricinus communis, a native of India, but now distributed over all the warmer regions of the globe. The oil is obtained from the seeds by bruising them between rollers and then pressing them in hempen bags in a strong press. The oil that first comes away, called cold-drawn castor-oil, is reckoned the best; an inferior quality being obtained by heating or steaming the pressed seeds, and again subjecting them to pressure. The oil is afterwards heated to the boiling point, which coagulates and separates the albumen and impurities. Castor-oil is used medicinally as a mild but efficient purgative. It is chiefly imported from India. The plant is cultivated in this country as an ornamental plant under the name of Palma Christi. It does not attain a greater height than 4 or 5 feet.

Nut of Castor-oil Plant.

Castory† (kas'to-ri), n. Apparently a substance drawn from castoreum, used in the preparation of colours; hence used by Spenser as the name of a colour. 'With fair vermilion or pure castory.'

> Atheists assert that the existence of things is casual. Dwight.

—Casual ejector, in law, the name given to the defendant in the fictitious action of ejectment formerly allowed by the law of England, where the real object of the action was to determine a title to land. To form the ground of such an action the person laying claim to the land granted a lease of it to a fictitious person, usually designated John Doe, and an action was then raised in the name of John Doe against another fictitious person, usually designated Richard Roe (the casual ejector), who was stated to have illegally ejected him from the land which he held on lease. As the prosecution of this action involved the proving of the lessor's right to grant a lease, the real object of the action thus came to be incidentally determined. This action was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 15 and 16 Vict. lxxvi.—Accidental, Casual, Fortuitous, Contingent, Incidental. See ACCIDENTAL.

Casuistically (kaz-ū-ist'ik-al-li or kazh-ū-ist'ik-al-li), adv. In a casuistic manner.

Casuistry (kaz'ū-ist-ri or kazh'ū-ist-ri), n. The science, doctrine, or department of ethics dealing with cases of conscience; the science which decides as to right and wrong in conduct, determining the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what a man may do by rules and principles drawn from the Scriptures, from the laws of society, or from equity and natural reason.

> All that philosophy of right and wrong which has become famous or infamous under the name of casuistry had its origin in the distinction between mortal and venial sin. Cambridge Essays, 1856.

Cat (kat), n. [A. Sax. cat, catt, a widely spread word: D. and Dan. kat, Sw. katt, Icel. köttr, G. katze, kater, O.Fr. cat, Mod. Fr. chat, It. gatto, L.L. catus, Ir. cat, W. cath, Rus. and Pol. kot, Tur. kedi, Ar. qitt —a cat. What is the origin and how far borrowing has taken place between the different languages is not known.] 1. A name applied to certain species of carnivorous quadrupeds, of the genus Felis. The domestic cat (F. domestica) is too well known to require description. It is uncertain whether any animal now existing in a wild state is the prototype of the domestic cat; probably it is descended from a cat originally domesticated in Egypt, though some regard the wild cat of Europe (F. catus) as the same species. The wild cat is much larger than the domestic cat, strong and ferocious, and very destructive to poultry, lambs, &c.—2. [Comp. Icel. kati, a small vessel.] A ship formed on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and a deep waist.—3. A strong tackle or combination of pulleys, to hook and draw an anchor perpendicularly up to the cat-head of a ship. 4. A double tripod having six feet: so called because it always lands on its feet as a cat is proverbially said to do.—5. A game. See TIP-CAT.—6. An abbreviation of cat-o'-nine-tails (which see).—A cat in the pan, a false-hood given out as coming from one who did not originate it.—To turn a cat-in-pan, to make a sudden change of party in politics or religion from interested motives. 'The phrase seems to be the French tourner côte en peine (to turn sides in trouble).' Brewer.

> When George in pudding-time came o'er,
> And moderate men looked big, sir,
> I turned a cat-in-pan once more,
> And so became a Whig, sir. Vicar of Bray.

—To let the cat out of the bag, to disclose a trick; to let out a secret: said to have had its origin in a trick practised by country people of substituting a cat for a young pig and bringing it to market in a bag. The purchaser sometimes thought, however, of opening the bag before the bargain was concluded; and thus let out the cat and disclosed the trick.—Cat-and-dog, as an adjective, like a cat and dog; quarrelsome; disposed to fight; inharmonious; as, to lead a cat-and-dog life.—Cat-and-dog, as a noun. Same as Tip-cat (which see).—To rain cats and dogs, to pour down violently and incessantly.

Cat (kat), v.t. To draw (an anchor) up to the cat-head.

Cata- (kat'a). [GR. kata.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying against; opposed or contrary to; under, down, or downward; part by part; and sometimes, thoroughly, completely.

Catabaptist (kat-a-bap'tist), n. [Gr. kata, against, and baptizō, to baptize.] One who opposes baptism. [Rare.]

Catabasion (kat-a-bā'zi-on), n. [Gr. katabasion, a way leading downwards—kata, down, and bainō, to go.] A chamber or vault under the altar of a Greek church, where relics are kept.

Catabrosa (kat-a-brō'sa), n. [Gr. katabrōsis, a gnawing, from the fact that the glumes are truncated, appearing as if gnawed away at the top.] A small genus of grasses, with some half-a-dozen species, natives of cold and temperate regions. One species (C. aquatica) occurs in watery places throughout Britain. It is a soft bright-green flaccid grass, much sought after by aquatic birds.

Catacaustic (kat-a-kąs'tik), a. [Gr. katakaustis, a burning.] In geom. a term denoting a species of caustic curves formed by reflection.

Catacaustic (kat-a-kąs'tik), n. In optics, a caustic curve formed by the reflection of rays of light, the name being given to distinguish these curves from the diacaustic, formed by refracted rays. See CAUSTIC.

Catachresis (kat-a-krē'sis), n. [Gr. katachrēsis, abuse—kata, against, and chraomai, to use.] 1. An abuse of a trope or of words; a figure in rhetoric, when one word is wrongly put for another, or when a word is too far wrested from its true signification; as, to speak of tones being made more palatable for 'agreeable to the ear.' So in Scripture we read of the blood of the grape. Deut. xxxii. 14.—2. In philol. the employment of a word under a false form through misapprehension in regard to its origin; thus causeway, and crayfish or crawfish, have their forms by catachresis.

Catachrestic, Catachrestical (kat-a-kres'tik, kat-a-kres'tik-al), a. In rhet. and gram. belonging to a catachresis; forced; far-fetched; wrested from its natural sense, use, or form.

Catachrestically (kat-a-kres'tik-al-li), adv. In a catachrestical manner.

Cataclysm (kat'a-klizm), n. [Gr. kataklysmos, a deluge, from kataklyzō, to inundate —kata, against, down, and klyzō, to wash.] 1. A deluge or overflowing of water; a flood; specifically, the flood in Noah's days.—2. In geol. a term sometimes applied to denote various inundations or deluges, or physical catastrophes of great extent, supposed to have occurred at different periods, and to have been the efficient cause of various phenomena, as the deposition of different formations of diluvium or drift, rather than the gradual action of moderate currents, or that of ice.

Cataclysmal, Cataclysmic (kat-a-kliz'mal, kat-a-kliz'mik), a. Of or belonging to a cataclysm.

Catacomb (kat'a-kōm), n. [It. catacomba, L.L. catacumba, from Gr. kata, down, and kumbē, kumbos, a hollow or recess.] A cave or subterraneous place for the burial of the dead, the bodies being deposited in graves or recesses called loculi, hollowed out of the sides of the cave. The term is said to have been originally applied to the chapel of St. Sebastian in Rome, where the ancient Roman calendars say the body of St. Peter was deposited. It is now applied to a vast number of subterraneous sepulchres, in the environs of Rome, on the Appian Way; supposed to be the cells and caves in which the primitive Christians concealed themselves, and in which were deposited the bodies of the primitive martyrs. These are visited by devout people, and relics are taken from them, blessed by the pope, and dispersed through Catholic countries. Each gallery is 3 feet broad and 8 or 10 high. The sepulchral niches (loculi) along the side walls are closed with thick tiles or pieces of marble. Catacombs are found also at Naples, Cairo, Paris, &c. Those in Paris are in abandoned stone quarries, and extend under a large portion of the city.

Catacoustics (kat-a-kous'tiks), n. [Gr. katakouō, to hear.] That part of acoustics, or the doctrine of sounds, which treats of reflected sounds, or of the properties of echoes; cataphonics.

Catadioptric, Catadioptrical (kat'a-di-op"trik, kat'a-di-op"trik-al), a. [Gr. kata, and dioptomai, to see through.] Pertaining to or involving both the refraction and reflection of light.—Catadioptric telescope, the same as reflecting telescope.

Catadrome (kat'a-drōm), n. [Gr. katadromos, a race-course—kata, down, and dromos, a race, a course.] 1. A race-course. 2. A machine used in building for raising and lowering heavy weights.

Catadupe† (kat'a-dūp), n. [Fr. catadupe, catadoupe, from Gr. katadoupoi, the cataracts of the Nile, from katá, down, and doupéo, to sound, from doupos, a dull sound as of a falling body.] A cataract or waterfall. 'The Egyptian catadupes.' Ant. Brewer.

Catafalque, Catafalco (kat'a-falk, kat-a-fal'ko), n. [Fr. catafalque, from It. catafalco, a catafalque, from falco for O.H.G. palcho (G. balke), a beam, with cata (the verbal stem seen in Sp. catar, to view) prefixed. Scaffold is really the same word with French prefix es.] A temporary structure of carpentry, decorated with painting and sculpture, representing a tomb or cenotaph, placed over the coffin of a distinguished person at the altar in churches, as also sometimes over his grave, where it usually remains for some months after the interment.

Catagmatic (kat-ag-mat'ik), a. [Gr. katagma, a fragment.] In med. having the property of consolidating broken parts; promoting the union of fractured bones.

Catagmatic (kat-ag-mat'ik), n. In med. a remedy believed to promote the union of fractured parts. Dunglison.

Catagraph† (kat'a-graf), n. [Gr. kata, down, and graphō, to write.] The first draft of a picture; also a profile.

Cataian† (ka-tā'an), n. A native of Cathay or China; a foreigner generally; and hence, in old writers, an indiscriminate term of reproach.

I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man. Shak.

Catalan (kat'a-lan), a. Pertaining to Catalonia, a province of Spain, or to its inhabitants or language.

Catalan (kat'a-lan), n. 1. A native of Catalonia.—2. The language of Catalonia, a language which holds a position similar to the Provençal, having been early cultivated and boasting a considerable literature.

Catalectic (kat-a-lek'tik), a. [L. catalecticus; Gr. katalēktikos, from katalēgo, to leave off, to stop.] In pros. having the measure incomplete. A catalectic verse is one which wants a syllable of its proper length, or which terminates in an imperfect foot.

Catalectic (kat-a-lek'tik), n. In pros. a catalectic verse.

Catalepsy, Catalepsis (kat'a-lep-si, kat-a-lep'sis), n. [Gr. katalēpsis, a seizing, from katalambanō, to take, seize, or invade.] A rare affection, generally connected with hysteria, in which there is a sudden suspension of the senses and volition, with statue-like fixedness of the body and limbs in the attitude immediately preceding the attack, while the action of the heart and lungs continues.

Note the fetichism wrapped up in the etymologies of these Greek words. Catalepsy, a seizing of the body by some spirit or demon, who holds it rigid. Ecstacy, a displacement or removal of the soul from the body, into which the demon enters and causes strange laughing, crying, or contortions. It is not metaphor, but the literal belief in a ghost-world, which has given rise to such words as these, and to such expressions as 'a man beside himself or transported.' John Fiske.

Cataleptic (kat-a-lep'tik), a. Pertaining to catalepsy.

Catallactically (kat-al-lak'tik-al-li), adv. [See below.] In exchange; in return.

You may grow for your neighbour, at your liking, grapes or grapeshot; he will also catallactically grow grapes or grapeshot for you, and you will each reap what you have sown. Ruskin.

Catallactics (kat-al-lak'tiks), n. pl. [Gr. katallassō, to exchange money—kata, quite, and allassō, to exchange.] The science of exchange, a branch of political economy.

The science of exchange, or, as I hear it has been proposed to call it, of catallactics, considered as one of gain is, therefore, simply nugatory. Ruskin.

Catalogize (kat'a-lo-gīz), v.t. To insert in a catalogue.

Catalogue (kat'a-log), n. [Fr. catalogue, from Gr. katalogos, a counting up—kata, down, and logos, a reckoning.] A list or enumeration of the names of men or things disposed in a certain order, often in alphabetical order; as, a catalogue of the students of a college, or of books, or of the stars.—List, Catalogue. List means a mere enumeration of individual persons or articles, while catalogue properly supposes some description, with the names in a certain order. Thus we speak of a subscription list, but the catalogue of a museum or library.—Catalogue raisonné, a catalogue of books, paintings, &c., classed according to their subjects.

Catalogue (kat'a-log), v.t. pret. & pp. catalogued; ppr. cataloguing. To make a catalogue of.

It (Scripture) cannot, as it were, be mapped or its contents catalogued. J. H. Newman.

Catalpa (ka-tal'pa), n. [The Indian name in Carolina for the first species mentioned below.] A genus of plants, nat. order Bignoniaceæ. The species are trees with simple leaves and terminal panicled trun petshaped flowers, which from their great beauty, large size, gay colours, and great abundance, are often among the most striking objects of a tropical forest. C. syringæfolia, a North American species, is well adapted for large shrubberies; its branches are used for dyeing wool of a cinnamon colour. C. longissima contains much tannin in its bark, and is known in the West Indies by the name of French oak.

Catalysis (ka-tal'i-sis), n. [Gr. katalysis, from kata, down, and lyō, to loose.] 1. Dissolution; destruction; degeneration; decay. 'Sad catalysis and declension of piety.' Evelyn.

The sad catalysis did come, and swept away eleven hundred thousand of the nation. Jer. Taylor.

2. A decomposition and new combination, supposed by Berzelius and other chemists to be produced among the proximate and elementary principles of one or more compounds, by virtue of the mere presence of a substance or substances which do not of themselves enter into combination. Liebig questions this theory, and refers the effects to other causes.

Catalytic (kat-a-lit'ik), a. Relating to catalysis.—Catalytic force, that modification of the force of chemical affinity in certain bodies by which they resolve others into new compounds merely by contact with them, or by an action of presence, as it has been termed.—Catalytic agent, (a) a body which produces chemical changes in another merely by contact; thus yeast resolves sugar, by contact, into carbonic acid and alcohol. (b) In med. a medicine which is presumed to act by the destruction or counteraction of morbid agencies in the blood.

Catamaran (kat'a-ma-ran"), n. [Said to be from a Tamil word signifying 'tied logs.'] 1. A kind of float or raft used by some foreign peoples. It consists usually of three pieces of wood lashed together, the middle piece being longer than the others, and having one end turned up in the form of a bow. It is used on the coasts of Coromandel, and particularly at Madras, for conveying letters, messages, &c., through the surf to the shipping in the roads. Catamarans are used also in short navigations along the sea-shore in the West Indies, and on the coast of South America catamarans of a very large size are employed. This name was also applied to the flat-bottomed boats constructed by Bonaparte for the invasion of England.—2. A quarrelsome woman; a vixen; a scold: most probably employed in this sense because supposed to be some sort of cat, or in some way connected with cat, as catamount is. 'At his expense, you catamaran!' Dickens.

She was such an obstinate old catamaran. Macmillan's Mag.

Catamenia (kat-a-mē'ni-a), n. pl. [Gr. katamēnios, monthly—kata, in distributive sense, and mēn, a month.] The monthly flowings of females; menstrual discharge; menses.

Catamenial (kat-a-mē'ni-al), a. Pertaining to the catamenia or menstrual discharges.

Catamite (kat'a-mīt), n. [L. catamitus.] A boy kept for unnatural purposes.

Catamount, Catamountain (kat'a-mount, kat-a-mount'ān or kat-a-mount'in), n. 1. The cat of the mountain; the wild cat. 'The glaring catamountain and the quill-darting porcupine.' Martinus Scriblerus.—2. In her. a charge always borne guardant.—3. In America, the North American tiger, the puma, cougar, or 'painter' (Felis or Puma concolor).

Cat-a-mountain (kat-a-mount'ān or kat-a-mount'in), a. Like a wild cat; ferocious; wildly savage. 'Cat-a-mountain looks.' Shak.

Catanadromous, Catandromous (kat-a-nad'rō-mus, ka-tan'drō-mus), a. [Gr. kata, down, ana, up, and dromos, a course or race.] Passing once a year from salt water into fresh and returning: applied to such fish as the salmon.

Catapasm (kat'a-pazm), n. [Gr. katapasma.] A dry powder employed by the ancients to sprinkle on ulcers, absorb perspiration, &c.

Catapeltic† (kat-a-pel'tik), n. A catapult.

Catapeltic† (kat-a-pel'tik), a. Pertaining to the catapult.

Catapetalous (kat-a-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. kata, against, and petalon, a petal.] In bot. having the petals held together by stamens which grow to their bases, as in the mallow.

Cataphonic (kat-a-fon'ik), a. Relating to cataphonics.

Cataphonics (kat-a-fon'iks), n. [Gr. kata, against, and phōnē, sound.] The doctrine of reflected sounds, a branch of acoustics; catacoustics.

Cataphora (ka-taf'o-ra), n. [Gr. kataphora, from kata, down, and pherō, to bear.] A variety of lethargy or somnolency attended with short remissions or intervals of imperfect waking, sensation, and speech.

Cataphract (kat'a-frakt), n. [L. cataphractes, Gr. kataphraktēs, from kataphrassō, to cover.] 1. Milit. a piece of heavy defensive armour formed of cloth or leather strengthened with scales or links, used to defend the breast or whole body, or even the horse as well as the rider. 'Archers and slingers, cataphracts and spears.' Milton.—2. In zool. the armour of plates or strong scales protecting some animals.

Cataphracted (kat'a-frakt-ed), a. In zool. covered with horny or bony plates or scales closely joined together, or with a thick hardened skin.

Cataphracti (kat-a-frak'tī), n. pl. [See CATAPHRACT.] A group of acanthopterygious fishes, provided with strong face plates and spines, of which the gurnard is a well-known example. See SCLEROGENIDÆ.

Cataphractic (kat-a-frak'tik), a. Pertaining to a cataphract; resembling a cataphract.

Cataphrygian (kat-a-frij'i-an), n. One of a sect of Christian heretics of the second century who followed the errors of Montanus: so named because they first came out of Phrygia. See MONTANIST.

Cataplasm (kat'a-plazm), n. [Gr. kataplasma, from kataplassō, to anoint or to spread as a plaster.] In med. a soft and moist substance to be applied to some part of the body; a poultice.

Catapuce† (kat'a-pūs), n. [Fr. catapuce, Sp. and Pg. catapucia.] The herb spurge. Chaucer.

Catapult (kat'a-pult), n. [L. catapulta, from Gr. katapeltēs—kata, against, and pallō, to brandish, swing, hurl.] 1. One of the great military engines used by ancient nations for discharging missiles against a besieged place: originally distinguished from the ballista as being intended for discharging heavy darts or lances, while the latter was used for throwing heavy stones and other bulky missiles, but afterwards confounded with the ballista. In principle the catapult proper, as distinguished from the ballista, resembled the mediæval arbalist, being a powerful kind of bow, but it was much stronger than the latter weapon, and was worked by machinery. In the annexed cut, which represents a catapult of the later period when no distinction was made between it and the ballista, F represents the end of a strong lever, which revolves on an axis and is held down by a windlass A. At the extremity is a fork EE, with the prongs curving slightly upward so as to afford a bed for a barrel of combustible matter or iron confined by a rope with a loop at the end, the loop being passed through a hook D. When the lever is relieved it bounds suddenly upwards, the centrifugal force causing the loop C to slip off the hook, whereupon the barrel held on the fork is liberated and projected towards its object. B shows rings of iron, stone, or lead, increasing the rebound. — 2. A small forked stick, to each prong of which is attached an elastic band, generally provided with a piece of leather in the middle, used by boys for throwing small missiles, such as stones, peas, paper pellets, and the like.

Catapultic (kat-a-pul'tik), a. Pertaining to a catapult.

Cataract (kat'a-rakt), n. [L. cataracta, Gr. katarraktēs, from kata, down, and rhēgnymi, to break.] 1. A great fall of water over a precipice, as that of Niagara, of the Rhine, Danube, &c.; a water-fall. 'Cataracts and hurricanoes.' Shak. 'The tremendous cataracts of America thundering in their solitudes.' Irving. —2. More generally, any furious rush or downpour of water. 'The hollow ocean-ridges roaring into cataracts.' Tennyson. —3. A disease of the eye consisting in an opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, by which the pupil seems closed by an opaque body, usually whitish, but sometimes blue, gray, brown, &c., vision being thus impaired or destroyed. — 4. In fort. See HERSE, 1 (a). —5. A form of water-governor for regulating the stroke of single-acting steam-engines.

Cataractous (kat-a-rak'tus), a. Partaking of the nature of a cataract in the eye.

Catarrh (ka-tär'), n. [L. catarrhus, Gr. katarrhoos, from katarrheō, to flow down.] A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane, especially a discharge or increased secretion of mucus from the membranes of the nose, fauces, and bronchia, with fever, sneezing, cough, thirst, lassitude, and loss of appetite, and sometimes an entire loss of taste; the ailment of which this discharge is an accompaniment, commonly called a cold. 'Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs.' Milton.

Catarrhal, Catarrhous (ka-tär'ral, ka-tär'rus), a. Pertaining to catarrh, produced by it, or attending it; as, a catarrhal fever.

Catarrhina, Catarhina (kat-a-rī'na), n. pl. [Gr. kata, down, and rhis, rhinos, the nose.] A section of quadrumanous animals, including those monkeys which have the nostrils approximated, the aperture pointing downwards, and the intervening septum narrow, as in the apes of the Old World. The Barbary ape, gorilla, chimpanzee, orang, &c., are included in this section.

Catarrhine, Catarhine (kat'a-rīn), n. A monkey of the section Catarrhina.

Catarrhine, Catarhine (kat'a-rīn), a. Of or pertaining to the section of monkeys Catarrhina.

The catarhine monkeys are restricted entirely to the Old World. H. A. Nicholson.

Catastaltic (kat-a-stal'tik), a. [Gr. katastaltikos, from katastellō—kata, down, and stellō, to send.] A term applied to medicines which repress evacuations, as astringents and styptics.

Catastasis (ka-tas'ta-sis), n. [Gr. katastasis, from kathistēmi, to constitute.] 1. In rhet. the narration or the narrative part of the orator's speech, in which he unfolds the matter in question, and which generally forms the exordium. — 2. In med. the constitution, state, or condition of anything.

Catasterism (ka-tas'tėr-izm), n. [Gr. katasterismos, from katasterizō, to distinguish with stars or to place among the stars—kata, down, and astēr, a star.] A placing among the stars; a cataloguing of the stars.

His catalogue contains no bright star which is not found in the 'catasterisms' of Eratosthenes. Whewell.

Catastomus (ka-tas'tō-mus), n. [Gr. kata, down, and stoma, a mouth.] A genus of teleostean fishes, allied to the carps, belonging to the Abdominal Malacopterygii, and family Cyprinidæ. The fishes of this genus are peculiar to the rivers of North America.

Catastrophe (ka-tas'trō-fe), n. [Gr. katastrophē, an overthrowing, a sudden turn, from katastrephō, to subvert—kata, down, and strephō, to turn.] 1. The arrangement of actions or interconnection of causes which leads up to the final event of a dramatic piece; the unfolding and winding up of the plot, clearing up difficulties, and closing the play; the dénouement. The ancients divided a play into the protasis, epitasis, catastasis, and catastrophe, the introduction, continuance, heightening, and development or conclusion.

Pat he comes, like the catastrophe of the old comedy. Shak.

2. A notable event terminating a series; a finishing stroke or wind-up; an unfortunate conclusion; a calamity, or disaster.

Here was a mighty revolution, the most horrible and portentous catastrophe that nature ever yet saw. Woodward.

3. In geol. a supposed change in the globe from sudden physical violence, causing elevation or subsidence of the solid parts; a cataclysm.

Great changes, of a kind and intensity quite different from the common course of events, and which may therefore properly be called catastrophes, have taken place upon the earth's surface. Whewell.

Catastrophic, Catastrophist (ka-tas-trof'ik, ka-tas'trō-fist), a. 1. Pertaining to a catastrophe or catastrophes. —2. In geol. pertaining to the theory of great changes on the globe being due to violent and sudden physical action; as, catastrophic opinions.

There is an opposite tendency in the mode of maintaining the catastrophist and uniformitarian opinions. Whewell.

The hypothesis of uniformity cannot possess any essential simplicity which, previous to inquiry, gives it a claim upon our assent superior to that of the opposite catastrophic hypothesis. Whewell.

Catastrophist (ka-tas'trō-fist), n. In geol. one who believes that geological changes are due to catastrophes or sudden violent physical causes: opposed to uniformitarian (which see).

The catastrophist is affirmative, the uniformitarian is negative in his assertions. Whewell.

Catastrophy† (ka-tas'trō-fi), n. Same as Catastrophe.

Catawba (ka-ta'ba), n. 1. A variety of grape much cultivated in Ohio, United States, and first discovered on the Catawba river, Carolina. It is of a rich claret colour when ripe. 2. The wine made from the grape. It is a light sparkling wine, of rich Muscadine flavour, much used in the United States.

Very good in its way
Is the Verzenay,
Or the Sillery soft and creamy;
But Catawba wine
Has a taste more divine,
More dulcet, delicious, and dreamy. Longfellow.

Cat-beam (kat'bēm), n. Naut. the longest and one of the principal beams of a ship.

Cat-bird (kat'bėrd), n. The Turdus lividus of Wilson (Turdus felivox and Mimus carolinensis of others), a well-known species of American thrush, found abundantly throughout the middle and New England states, frequenting thickets or the shrubberies of gardens. Its note resembles the plaint of a kitten in distress, hence its name. Its plumage is lead-coloured; it is about 9 inches in length, and very lively in its movements.

Cat-block (kat'blok), n. Naut. a two or three fold block with an iron strap and large hook used to draw up an anchor to the cat-head.

Catcall (kat'kal), n. [Cat and call.] A squeaking instrument, used in play-houses to denote disapprobation or weariness of the performance, or a sound made in imitation of the tone of this instrument.

He (play-writer) sees his branded name, with wild affright,
And hears again the catcalls of the night. Crabbe.

Catcall (kat'kal), v.t. To use a catcall, or to make sounds like those of a catcall against.

She had too much sense not to know that it was better to be hissed and catcalled by her daddy than by a whole sea of heads in the pit of Drury Lane theatre. Macaulay.

Catch (kach), v.t. pret. & pp. caught (catched is obsolete or vulgar); ppr. catching. [O.E. cacche, cache, O.Fr. cachier, cacher, &c., to hunt = Mod. Fr. chasser, It. cacciare, from a L.L. captiare, from L. captare, an aug. or freq. from capere, to take. Chase is the same word under a different form.] 1. To lay sudden hold on; to seize, especially with the hand; to grasp. 'Ready to catch each other by the throat.' Shak. 'Caught the white goose by the leg.' Tennyson. Specifically — 2. To seize with the hand or hands something passing through the air, and keep hold of it without allowing it to drop: as, to catch a ball. —To catch out, at cricket, to put the batsman out of play by catching the ball before it has touched the ground after leaving the batsman's bat. — 3. To seize, as in a snare or trap; to ensnare; to entangle; as, to catch rats or birds: often used figuratively in this sense.

They sent certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians to catch him in his words. Mark xii. 13.

4. To get entangled with, or to come into contact or collision with; as, the nave of the wheel caught the open door of a passing carriage. — 5. To seize in pursuit; to apprehend; to arrest.

The mild hind makes speed to catch the tiger. Shak.

6. To attain; to get possession of. 'Torment myself to catch the English crown.' Shak. — 7. To get; to receive.

Fight closer, or, good faith, you'll catch a blow. Shak.
The Church of Carnac, by the strand
Catches the westering sun's last fires. Matt. Arnold.

8. Especially, to take or receive by sympathy, imitation, contagion, or infection; as, to catch the spirit of an occasion; to catch a melody; to catch cold or measles.

A man takes mercury, goes out of doors and catches cold. J. S. Mill.

9. To take hold of; to communicate to; to fasten on; as, the fire caught the adjoining building. — 10. To seize the affections of; to engage and attach; to charm; to captivate. 'The soothing arts that catch the fair.' Dryden. — 11. To come on suddenly, unexpectedly, or accidentally.

We shall catch them at their sport;
And our sudden coming there
Will double all their mirth and chere. Milton.

12. To seize or apprehend by the senses or the intellect. 'I caught a glimpse of his face.' Tennyson.

Cleopatra, catching but the least noise of this, dies instantly. Shak.

Fiery thoughts
Do shape themselves within me, more and more,
Whereof I catch the issue. Tennyson.

—Catch me! or in full, Catch me if you can, an emphatic phrase intended to intimate that a person will not do a thing. [Colloq.] —To catch fire, to become ignited. —To catch it, to get a scolding, a beating, or other unpleasant treatment. [Colloq.] —To catch one a blow, to inflict a blow on him. [Colloq.] —To catch one on the hip, to get the advantage of one; to get one under one's power. See under HIP. —To catch hold of, to take or lay hold of. —To catch up, to snatch; to take up suddenly. —To catch a Tartar. See under TARTAR. —First catch your hare, a direction occurring in later editions of the well-known cookery-book attributed to Mrs. Glasse, and used as an aphorism to the effect that, before disposing of a thing, you ought to make sure of the possession of it. In reality the saying arose from a misprint, catch being an error for case, in the sense of to skin. Properly therefore the direction is, 'First case (skin) your hare,' &c. See CASE, v.t.

Catch (kach), v.i. 1. To acquire possession. 'Have is have, however men do catch.' Shak. — 2. To be entangled or impeded; to remain fast; to hitch: as, my clothes caught in the briers; the lock catches.

Don't open your mouth as wide as that, young man, or it'll catch so and not shut again some day. Dickens.

3. To take proper hold so as to act; as, the bolt does not catch.—4. To communicate; to spread by or as by infection.

Does the sedition catch from man to man,
And run among the ranks? Addison.

5. To endeavour to lay hold of; to be eager to get, use, or adopt: with at.

Saucy lictors
Will catch at us like strumpets. Shak.

Catch (kach), n. 1. The act of seizing; seizure.

She would fain the catch of Strephon fly. Sir P. Sidney.

2. Anything that seizes or takes hold, that checks motion or the like, as a hook, a ratchet, a pawl, a spring bolt for a door or lid, and various contrivances employed in machinery for the purpose of stopping or checking certain movements.—3. A choking or stoppage of the breath. 'Heard the deep catches of his labouring breath.' Macmillan's Mag.—4. The posture of seizing; a state of preparation to catch or of watching an opportunity to seize.

Both of them lay upon the catch for a great action. Addison.

5. Something valuable or desirable obtained or to be obtained; a gain or advantage; often, colloquially, one desirable from wealth as a husband or wife.

Hector shall have a great catch if he knock out either of your brains. Shak.

She entered freely into the state of her affairs, asked his advice upon money matters, and fully proved to his satisfaction that, independent of her beauty, she would be a much greater catch than Frau Vandersloosh. Marryatt.

6. A snatch; a short interval of action.

It has been writ by catches. Locke.

7. A slight hold on the memory; a slight remembrance.

We retain a catch of those pretty stories, and our awakened imagination smiles in the recollection. Glanville.

8. A hold or advantage over a person.—9. In music, a kind of canon or round for three or four voices, the words written to which are so contrived that by the union of the voices a different meaning is given by the singers catching at each other's words.

Shall we rouse the night-owl in a catch that will draw three souls out of one weaver? Shak.

10. In cricket, (a) a ball struck by the batsman in such a manner as to be caught, or to be in danger of being caught, by one of the fielders before it touches the ground. (b) The act of catching a ball; as, a good catch.

Catchable (kach'a-bl), a. Capable of being caught.

The eagerness of a knave makes him often as catchable as the ignorance of a fool. Ld. Halifax.

Catch-club (kach'klub), n. A club or society formed for singing catches, &c.

Catch-drain (kach'drān), n. 1. A drain along the side of a canal or other conduit to catch the surplus water.—2. A drain running along sloping ground to catch and convey the water flowing over the surface. When a meadow is pretty long, and has a quick descent, the water is often stopped at different distances by catch-drains so as to spread it over the adjoining surface.

Catcher (kach'ėr), n. One who catches; that which catches, or in which anything is caught. 'That great catcher and devourer of souls.' South.

Catch-fly (kach'flī) n. The popular name of the species of plants belonging to the genus Silene and of Lychnis Viscaria because of their glutinous stems, which sometimes retain small insects.

Catching (kach'ing), a. 1. Communicating, or liable to be communicated, by contagion; infectious; as, a disease is catching.

Tis time to give them physic, their diseases
Are grown so catching. Shak.

2. Captivating; charming; attracting; as, a catching melody; a catching manner.

Catching-bargain (kach'ing-bär-gin), n. In law, a bargain made with the heir-apparent or expectant of a succession, for the purchase of his expectancy at an inadequate price.

Catch-land (kach'land), n. Land of which it was not known to what parish it belonged, and the tithe of which fell to the minister that could first catch it.

Catch-match (kach'mach), n. An agreement concluded hastily so that one party is taken advantage of.

Catch-meadow (kach'me-dō), n. A meadow which is irrigated by water from a spring or rivulet on the declivity of a hill.

Catchment (kach'ment), n. A surface of ground, of which the drainage is capable of being directed into a common reservoir; a natural basin of greater or less area, of which the water is collected for economical purposes. A water company is, accordingly, said to have so many square miles of catchment, or of catchment ground, when the supply depends on the area of surface-drainage.

Catch-penny (kach'pen-ni), n. Something of little value got up to hit the popular taste, and thereby catch the popular penny; anything seeming attractive got up merely to sell.

Catch-penny (kach'pen-ni), a. Made or got up to gain money; got up merely to sell; as, a catch-penny pamphlet.

Catch-poll (kach'pōl), n. [Catch, and poll, the head.] A sheriff's officer, bailiff, constable, or other person whose duty is to arrest persons: a term in use as early at least as the time of Chaucer.

Catchup, Catsup (kach'up, kat'sup), n. [Said to be from kitjap, an East Indian name for a kind of pickles.] A liquor extracted from mushrooms, walnuts, &c., used as a sauce. Written more commonly Ketchup (which see).

Catch-weed (kach'wēd), n. A weed which readily catches hold on what comes in contact with it; clivers.

Catchweight (kach'wāt), adv. In horse-racing, without any additional weight; without being handicapped; as, to ride catch-weight.

Come, I'll make this a match, if you like: you shall ride catchweight, which will be about 11 st. 7 lb., and I'll ride the Axeine at 14 st. 7 lb. Lawrence.

Catch-word (kach'wėrd), n. 1. In printing, the word formerly often, now rarely placed at the bottom of each page, under the right hand corner of the last line, and forming the first word on the following page.—2. In the drama, the last word of the preceding speaker, which reminds one that he is to speak next; cue.—3. A word caught up and repeated for effect; as, the catch-word of a political party.

Liberty, fraternity, equality, are as much as ever the party catch-words. Quart. Rev.

Catch-work (kach'wėrk), n. An artificial water-course or series of water-courses for throwing water on such lands as lie on the declivity of hills; a catch-drain.

Cate (kāt), n. [O.E. acates, provisions purchased, from O.Fr. acat, buying. See CATER.] Food; viands; provisions, more particularly rich, luxuriant, or dainty food; a delicacy; a dainty. 'Christmas pye, which is a kind of consecrated cate.' Tatler. The word is commonly used in the plural.

I had rather live
With cheese and garlic in a windmill, far,
Than feed on cates and have him talk to me. Shak.

Catechetic, Catechetical (kat-ē-ket'ik, kat-ē-ket'ik-al), a. [See CATECHISE.] Relating to or consisting in asking questions and receiving answers, according to the ancient manner of teaching pupils.

Socrates introduced a catechetical method of arguing. Addison.

Catechetically (kat-ē-ket'ik-al-li), adv. In a catechetical manner; by question and answer.

Catechetics (kat-ē-ket'iks), n. The art or practice of teaching by question and answer.

Catechin, Catechine (kat'ē-shin), n. [From catechu.] A peculiar principle, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, contained in that portion of catechu which is insoluble in cold water. It forms a fine white powder composed of silky nodules. It exists not merely in catechu, strictly so called, but also in gambier and some kinds of cinchona-bark.

Catechisation, Catechization (kat'ē-kiz-ā"shon), n. The act of catechising.

Catechise, Catechize (kat'ē-kīz), v.t. pret. & pp. catechised, catechized; ppr. catechising, catechizing. [Gr. katēchizō, to catechize; a form derived from katēcheō, to sound, to utter sound, to teach by the voice—kata, down, and ēcheō, to sound, whence echo.] 1. To instruct by asking questions, receiving answers, and offering explanations and corrections; specifically, so to instruct on points of Christian doctrine. 'Catechize gross ignorance.' Burton.—2. To question; to interrogate; to examine or try by questions, and sometimes with a view to reproof, by eliciting answers from a person which condemn his own conduct.

I'm stopp'd by all the fools I meet
And catechized in every street. Swift.

Catechiser, Catechizer (kat'ē-kiz-ėr), n. One who catechises; one who instructs by question and answer, and particularly in the rudiments of the Christian religion.

Catechism (kat'ē-kizm), n. [Gr. katēchismos, instruction. See CATECHISE.] 1. A form of instruction by means of questions and answers, particularly in the principles of religion.—2. An elementary book containing a summary of principles in any science or art, but appropriately in religion, reduced to the form of questions and answers, and sometimes with notes, explanations, and references to authorities. The catechism of the Church of England in the first book of Edward VI., 7th March, 1549, contained merely the baptismal vow, the creed, the ten commandments, and the Lord's prayer, with explanations; the part relative to the sacraments being subjoined at the revision of the liturgy during the reign of James I. The catechism of the Church of Scotland is that agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, with the assistance of commissioners from the Church of Scotland, and approved of by the General Assembly in 1648. Luther's German catechisms appeared in 1529.

Catechismal (kat'ē-kiz-mal), a. Pertaining to or after the manner of a catechism; catechetical.

Catechist (kat'ē-kist), n. [Gr. katēchistēs.] One who instructs viva voce, or by question and answer; a catechiser; specifically, one appointed by the Church to instruct in the principles of religion.

Catechistic, Catechistical (kat-ē-kist'ik, kat-ē-kist'ik-al), a. Pertaining to a catechist or catechism. 'Some of them are in the catechistical method.' Burke.

Catechistically (kat-ē-kist'ik-al-li), adv. In a catechistical manner.

Catechu (kat'ē-shū), n. [From Tamil (?) katti, tree, and shu, juice, Malay kashu.] A name common to several astringent extracts prepared from the wood, bark, and fruits of various plants, especially by decoction and evaporation from the wood of Acacia Catechu, as well as from the seeds of the palm Areca Catechu, and from the Uncaria Gambier. Catechu is one of the best astringents to be found in the materia medica, and likewise one of the most common in use. It consists chiefly of tannin, and is used in tanning, in calico-printing, &c. Called also Cutch.

Catechuic (kat-ē-shū'ik), a. Of or pertaining to catechu.—Catechuic acid. Same as Catechin.

Catechumen (kat-ē-kū'men), n. [Gr. katēchoumenos, instructed. See CATECHISE.] 1. One who is under instruction in the first rudiments of Christianity; a neophyte. In the primitive church catechumens were the children of believing parents or pagans not fully initiated in the principles of the Christian religion. They were admitted to this state by the imposition of hands and the sign of the cross.

The prayers of the church did not begin, in St. Austin's time, till the catechumens were dismissed. Stillingfleet.

2. Generally, one who is beginning to acquire any kind of doctrines or principles.

The same language is still held to the catechumens in Jacobitism. Bolingbroke.

Catechumenate (kat-ē-kū'men-āt), n. The state or condition of a catechumen.

Catechumenical (kat'ē-kū-men"ik-al), a. Belonging to catechumens.

Catechumenist † (kat-ē-kū'men-ist), n. A catechumen. Bp. Morton.

Categorematic (kat'ē-gor'ē-mat"ik), a. [Gr. katēgorēma, a predicate. See CATEGORY.] Conveying a whole term, i.e. either the subject or predicate of a proposition, in a single word.

It is not every word that is categorematic, that is, capable of being employed by itself as a term. Whately.

Categorematic (kat'ē-gor'ē-mat"ik), n. In logic, a word which is capable of being employed by itself as a term, that is, as a subject or as a predicate.

Categorematically (kat'ē-gor'ē-mat"ik-al-li), adv. In a categorematic manner.

Categorical (kat-ē-gor'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a category or the categories.—2. Absolute; positive; express; not relative or hypothetical; as, a categorical proposition, syllogism, or answer.

A categorical proposition is one which affirms or denies a predicate of a subject, absolutely and without any hypothesis. Whately.

A categorical answer is an express and pertinent reply to a question proposed. Fleming.

Categorical (kat-ē-gor'ik-al), n. In logic, a proposition affirming a thing absolutely and without any hypothesis. Categoricals are subdivided into pure and modal. A pure categorical asserts unconditionally and unreservedly; as, I live; man is mortal. A modal categorical asserts with a qualification; as, the wisest man may possibly be mistaken; a prejudiced historian will probably misrepresent the matter.

Categorically (kat-ē-gor'ik-al-li), adv. In a categorical manner; absolutely; directly; expressly; positively; as, to affirm categorically.

Categoricalness (kat-ē-gor'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being categorical, positive, or absolute.

Categorize (kat'ē-gor-iz), v.t. To place in a category or list; to class. [Rare.]

Category (kat'ē-gor-i), n. [Gr. katēgoria, an accusation, also a class or category, from katēgoreō, to accuse, show, demonstrate—kata, down, &c., and agoreō, to speak in an assembly, to harangue or denounce, from agora, a forum, judicial tribunal, or market.] 1. In logic and philos. one of the highest classes to which objects of thought can be referred; one of the universal forms of existence; predicament. Aristotle made ten categories, viz. substance, quantity, quality, relation, action, passion, time, place, situation, and possession. In the philosophy of Kant the term categories is applied to the primitive conceptions originating in the understanding independently of all experience (hence called pure conceptions) though incapable of being realized in thought except in their application to experience. These he divides into four classes, quantity, quality, relation, and modality, placing under the first class the conceptions of unity, plurality, and totality; under the second, reality, negation, and limitation; under the third, inherence and subsistence, causality and dependence, and community (mutual action); and under the fourth, possibility and impossibility, existence and non-existence, necessity and contingency. J. S. Mill applies the term categories to the most general heads under which everything that may be asserted of any subject may be arranged. Of these he makes five, existence, co-existence, sequence, causation, and resemblance, or considering causation as a peculiar case of sequence, four.

The categories or predicaments . . . were intended by Aristotle and his followers as an enumeration of all things capable of being named; an enumeration by the summa genera, i.e. the most extensive classes into which things could be distributed. J. S. Mill.

2. In a popular sense, class; order.

Infinitude . . . quite changes the nature of beings and exalts them into a different category. Cheyne.

Catel,† n. [See CATTLE, CHATTEL.] Property of all kinds; chattels; goods; valuables.

His tithe paied he ful fayre and wel
Both of his propre swinke, and his catel.
Chaucer.

Catelectrode (kat-ē-lek'trōd), n. [Gr. kata, down, and E. electrode.] The name given by Faraday to the negative electrode or pole of a voltaic battery; the positive electrode or pole being termed the anelectrode. See ELECTRODE.

Catena (ka-tē'na), n. [L.] A chain; a series of things connected with each other; any band or tie; a bond of union.—Catena patrum (eccles.), (a) a string or series of passages from the writings of various fathers, arranged for the elucidation of some portions of Scripture, as the psalms or gospels. The most celebrated is the catena aurea, a commentary on the gospels extracted by Thomas Aquinas from the writings of the fathers. (b) A continuous chronological series of extracts from the writings of the fathers to prove the existence of a uniform tradition about faith or morals.

Catenary, Catenarian (kat'ē-nar-i, kat-ē-nā'ri-an), a. [L. catenarius, from catena, a chain.] Relating to a chain; like a chain.—Catenary or catenarian curve, in geom. a curve formed by a rope or chain, of uniform density and thickness, when suspended or allowed to hang freely from two fixed points. It is interesting on account of the light it throws on the theory of arches, and also by reason of its application to the construction of suspension bridges.

Catenary (kat'ē-nar-i), n. A catenary curve. See the adjective.

Catenate† (kat'ē-nāt), v.t. [L. cateno, catenatum, from catena, a chain.] To chain or to connect in a series of links or ties; to concatenate. Bailey.

Catenation† (kat-ē-nā'shon), n. [See CATENATE.] Connection of links; union of parts, as in a chain; regular connection; concatenation. 'This catenation or conserving union.' Sir T. Browne.

Catenipora (kat-e-nip'ō-ra), n. [L. catena, a chain, and pora, a pore.] Chain-pore coral, a variety occurring fossil in palæozoic strata (in Britain only in the Silurian), so called from the chain-like arrangement of its pores or cells in polished specimens. Called also Halysites.

Catenulate (ka-ten'ū-lāt), a. [L. catenula, dim. of catena, a chain.] 1. Consisting of little links or chains.—2. In nat. hist. presenting on the surface a series of oblong tubercles resembling a chain.

Cater† (kā'tėr), n. [Abbrev. from the fuller form acater, acatour, a caterer or purchaser of provisions, from O.Fr. acateur, acator, a purchaser, from acater, acapter, to buy (Mod. Fr. acheter), from L.L. accaptare, to buy—L. ad, to, and captare, intens. of capere, to take.] A caterer; a purveyor. 'I am cook myself and mine own cater.' Beau. & Fl.

Cater (kā'tėr), v.i. [From the obsolete noun cater (which see).] To buy or provide for use, enjoyment, or entertainment; to purvey, as food, provisions, amusement, &c.: followed by for.

And he that doth the ravens feed,
Yea, providently caters for the sparrow,
Be comfort to my age. Shak.

Cater (kā'tėr), n. [Fr. quatre, four.] The four of cards or dice.

Cater (kā'tėr), v.t. To cut diagonally. Halliwell. [Provincial English.]

Cater-cornered (kā'tėr-kor'nėrd), a. [Fr. quatre, four.] Diagonal. [Provincial English and United States.]

Cater-cousin† (kā'tėr-kuz-n), n. A quatre-cousin; a remote relation. Shak.

Caterer (kā'tėr-ėr), n. [Lengthened form of obs. cater, a purchaser or caterer. See CATER, n.] A provider or purveyor of provisions; one who provides for any want or desire.

Let the caterer mind the taste of each guest.
B. Jonson.

Cateress (kā'tėr-es), n. A woman who caters; a female provider.

She, good cateress,
Means her provision only to the good. Milton.

Caterpillar (kat'ėr-pil-lėr), n. [O.E. catyrpel, a word of doubtful etymology. By some it is derived from O.Fr. chatepeleuse, a caterpillar, a weevil, lit. hairy she-cat, but this seems questionable. The first part of the word doubtless means cat (comp. caterwaul); perhaps the second part is to be referred to W. pilai, a moth or butterfly.] 1. Properly, the larva of the lepidopterous insects; but also applied to the larvæ of other insects, such as the Tenthredo or sawfly. Caterpillars are produced immediately from the egg; they are furnished with three pairs of true feet, and a number of fleshy abdominal legs named prolegs, and have the shape and appearance of a worm. They contain the embryo of the perfect insect inclosed within a muscular envelope, which is thrown off when the insect enters the nymph or chrysalis state, in which it remains for some time as if inanimate. It then throws off its last envelope and emerges an imago or perfect insect. Caterpillars generally feed on leaves or succulent vegetables, and are sometimes very destructive. See LARVA.—2. The popular name of plants of the genus Scorpiurus.

Caterpillar-eater (kat''ėr-pil-lėr-ēt'ėr), n. 1. A name given to the larvæ of certain ichneumon flies, from their being bred in the body of caterpillars, eating their way out.—2. A bird of the shrike family which lives on caterpillars. Called also Caterpillar-catcher.

Caterwaul (kat'ėr-wal), v.i. [From cat, and waul, in imitation of the sound made by a cat; O.E. caterwawe.] To cry as cats under the influence of the sexual instinct; to make a disagreeable howling or screeching.

The very cats caterwauled more horribly and pertinaciously there than I ever heard elsewhere.
Coleridge.

[Shakspere has the verbal noun Caterwauling.]

Catery† (kā'tėr-i), n. [See CATE, CATER.] The place where provisions are deposited.

Cat-eyed (kat'īd), a. Having eyes like a cat; hence, seeing well in the dark.

Cat-fall (kat'fal), n. Naut. the rope that forms the tackle for heaving up the anchor from the water's edge to the bow.

Cat-fish (kat'fish), n. 1. A remarkably voracious teleostean fish, the Anarrhichas lupus, belonging to the family of Gobies, known also as the Wolf-fish (which see).—2. The name common to several North American fish of the genus Pimelodus. P. catus (the common cat-fish) is known also as the Horned Pout and Bull-head.

Cat-footed (kat'fut-ed), a. Noiseless; quiet; stealthy.

I stole from court
With Cyril and with Florian, unperceived, Cat-footed thro' the town. Tennyson.

Cat-gold (kat'gōld), n. A variety of mica of a yellowish colour; sometimes applied to iron pyrites.

Catgut (kat'gut), n. [This name is an entire misnomer, as catgut does not seem to have ever been prepared from cats' intestines.] 1. The intestines of sheep (sometimes of the horse, the ass, or the mule), dried and twisted, used for strings of musical instruments, and for other purposes.—2. A sort of linen or canvas with wide interstices.

Catgut-scraper (kat'gut-skrāp-ėr), n. A derisive name for a violinist; a fiddler.

Catha (kath'a), n. [Ar. kat, khat.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Celastraceæ, mostly natives of Africa. The most interesting species of the genus is C. edulis, cultivated by the Arabs, and known as khat or cafta. It is a shrub without spines, growing about 10 feet in height, with smooth leaves of an elliptical form about 2 inches in length by 1 inch in width. The leaves and twigs are used in the preparation of a beverage possessing properties analogous to those of tea and coffee. The use of khat is of great antiquity, having preceded that of coffee, and it forms a considerable article of commerce amongst the Arabs.

Cathari (kath'a-rī), n. pl. [L., from Gr. katharos, pure.] Catharists. See CATHARIST.

Catharist (kath'a-rist), n. [Gr. katharos, pure.] One who pretends to more purity than others possess; a puritan. This term was specifically applied to, or used by, several bodies of sectaries at various periods; such as the Paulicians in the seventh century; the Anti-Catholic sects in the south of France and Piedmont of the twelfth century; the Montanists, the Novatians, &c.

Catharma (ka-thär'ma), n. [L.; Gr. katharma.] In med. an excrement; anything purged from the body naturally or by art.

Cat-harpin, Cat-harping (kat'härp-in, kat'härp-ing), n. One of the ropes (now iron cramps) serving to brace in the shrouds of the lower masts behind their respective yards, to tighten the shrouds and give more room to draw in the yards when the ship is close-hauled.

Catharsis (ka-thär'sis), n. [Gr. See CATHARTIC.] In med. a natural or artificial purgation of any passage; evacuation.

Cathartes (ka-thär'tēz), n. [Gr. kathartēs, a cleanser or scavenger.] A genus of the vulture family, containing the turkey-buzzard and other species of American vultures. Owing to their great use from their living on carrion, the species are often protected as public scavengers.

Cathartic, Cathartical (ka-thär'tik, ka-thär'tik-al), a. [Gr. kathartikos, from kathairō, to purge, katharos, clean.] Purgative; cleansing the bowels. 'Cathartic substances.' Pereira.

Cathartic (ka-thär'tik), n. A medicine that promotes alvine discharges and thus cleanses the stomach and bowels; a purge; a purgative.

Cathartically (ka-thär'tik-al-li), adv. In the manner of a cathartic.

Catharticalness (ka-thär'tik-al-nes), n. The quality of promoting discharges from the bowels.

Cathartine (ka-thär'tin), n. [See CATHARTIC, n.] A chemical substance obtained from the leaves of Cassia Senna and C. lanceolata. It is the purgative principle of senna, and has a bitter, nauseous taste. It is a brownish yellow, uncrystallizable, diaphanous mass. Also called Cathartina.

Cat-head (kat'hed), n. 1. A strong beam projecting horizontally over a ship's bows, carrying two or three sheaves, about which a rope called the cat-fall communicating with the cat-block passes.—2. A kind or nodule containing a fossil. 'The nodules with leaves in them called cat-heads.' Woodward.—3. In mining, a small capstan.

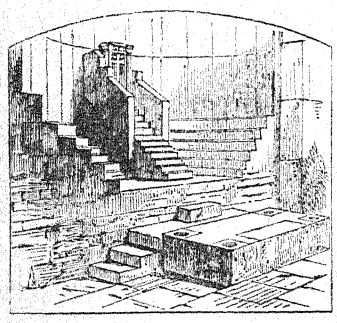
Cat-head Stopper, Cat-stopper (kat'hed stop-ėr, kat'stop-ėr), n. Naut. a piece of rope or chain rove through the ring of an anchor, for hanging it to the cat-head by, previously to casting anchor.

Cathedra (ka-thē'dra), n. [See CATHEDRAL.] 1. The throne or seat of a bishop in the cathedral or episcopal church of his diocese.



Cathedra at Torcello.

The bishop's throne or cathedra was formerly generally situated at the east end of the apse, and was often approached by a flight of steps, but it is now placed on one side of the choir, usually the south side. That of St. Peter's at Rome is especially honoured as having been the chair of St. Peter. It is now inclosed in a bronze covering.—2. The professional chair of any one entitled to teach with authority, as a professor's chair. Hence the phrase ex cathedra; as, speaking ex cathedra, speaking with authority.

Cathedral (ka-thē'dral), n. [L. cathedra, Gr. kathedra, a chair or seat—kata, down, and hedra, a seat.] The principal church in a diocese, that which is specially the church of the bishop: so called from possessing the episcopal chair called cathedra. The cathedral establishments in England regularly consist of a dean and chapter, presided over by the bishop, and forming the governing body, the chapter being composed of a certain number of canons. The dean and chapter meet in the chapter-house of the cathedral; in them the property of the cathedral is vested, and they nominally elect the bishop on a congé d'élire from the crown. Many cathedrals furnish the most magnificent examples of the architecture of the middle ages. Those in England are almost all in the Gothic style, cruciform in arrangement, and having connected with them a chapter-house, side-chapels, cloisters, crypt, &c. The adjoining cut shows the arrangement of these parts in Wells Cathedral, one of the most beautiful, though not one of the largest, of the English cathedrals.

Cathedral (ka-thē'dral), a. 1. Pertaining to the church which is the bishop's seat, or head church of a diocese; as, a cathedral church; cathedral service.—Cathedral music, music which has been composed to suit the form of service used in cathedrals.—2. Resembling a cathedral, or what belongs to a cathedral; as, cathedral walks. 'Huge cathedral fronts.' Tennyson.—3. Emanating from, or relating to, a chair of office; hence, having or displaying authority; authoritative.

Their personal errours are drowned in their cathedral abilities, which can neither do, nor ought to receive wrong. Waterhouse.

Caucasian (kạ-kā'zi-an or kạ-kā'zhi-an), n. In Blumenbach's ethnological system the highest type of the human family, including nearly all Europeans, the Circassians, Armenians, Persians, Indians, Jews, &c. He gave this name to the race because he regarded a skull he had got from Caucasus as the standard of the human type.

Caucus (kạ'kus), n. [American.] A private meeting of citizens to agree upon candidates to be proposed for election to offices, or to concert measures for supporting a party. According to one account the name caucus originated in a dispute which occurred at Boston, in New England, a short time previous to the revolution, between a party of English soldiers and the caulkers of the town, in consequence of which some of the citizens were killed by the soldiers. This led to meetings on the part of the inhabitants to concert measures for obtaining redress, and these meetings were by the soldiers called caulkers' meetings, which expression was soon corrupted into caucus meetings. Another and perhaps more plausible derivation, however, is from an Algonkin root meaning to speak, encourage, instigate, whence kaw-kaw-wus, a councillor, a 'caucusser.'

Caudal (kạ'dal), a. [L. cauda, a tail.] Pertaining to a tail; of the nature of a tail; having the appearance of a tail. 'A small caudal fin.' Pennant.

Causator† (kąz'ā-tėr), n. One who causes or produces an effect. Sir T. Browne.
Cause (kąz), n. [Fr. cause, L. causa, a cause.] 1. That which produces an effect; that which brings about a change; that by virtue of which anything is done; that from which anything proceeds, and without which it would not exist. In the system of Aristotle the word rendered by cause and its equivalents in modern language has a more extensive signification. He divides causes into four kinds: efficient, formal, material, and final. The efficient or first cause is the force or agency by which a result is produced; the formal, the means or instrument by which it is produced; the material, the substance from which it is produced; the final, the purpose or end for which it is produced.—2. The reason or motive that urges, moves, or impels the mind to act or decide.

For this cause have I raised thee up, for to shew in thee my power. Ex. ix. 16.

3. A suit or action in court; any legal process which a party institutes to obtain his demand, or by which he seeks his right or his supposed right; subject of litigation.

The cause of both parties shall come before the judges. Ex. xxii. 9.

4. In a general sense, any subject of question or debate; case; interest.

What counsel give you in this weighty cause? Shak.
I think of her whose gentle tongue
All plaint in her own cause controll'd. Matt. Arnold.
I did it not for his cause who had done the wrong. 2 Cor. vii. 12.

5. In a still more general sense, matter; affair. 'The cause craves haste.' Shak.—6. That side of a question which an individual or party takes up; that object to which the efforts of a person or party are directed.

They never fail who die
In a great cause. Byron.

7.† One of the degrees of quarrelling among duellists.

How did you find the quarrel on the seventh cause? Shak.

Cause (kąz), v.t. pret. & pp. caused; ppr. causing. To effect by agency; to bring about; to be the occasion of; to produce.

You cannot guess who caused your father's death. Shak.

Causeway, Causey (kąz'wā, kąz'zi), n. [The older and more correct spelling is causey, the word being from O.Fr. caucie (Mod. Fr. chaussée), Norm. calsay, from L.L. calciata (via, understood), a road in constructing which lime or mortar is used, from L. calx, calcis, lime. The spelling causeway arose from an erroneous notion that the word was a compound with way (road, path) as the second portion of it.] 1. A road or path raised above the natural level of the ground by stones, earth, timber, fascines, &c., serving as a dry passage over wet or marshy ground, or as a mole to confine water to a pond or restrain it from overflowing lower ground; a side-walk or path at the side of a street or road raised above the carriage-way. [Though causey is the more correct form, causeway seems firmly established.]

The other way Satan went down
The causey to hell-gate. Milton.

2. [Scotch.] (a) A road or street paved with blocks of stone. (b) The paving used for the purpose; as, to lay causey. [The Scotch form is always causey.]

Cavetto (ka-vet'tō), n. [It., from cavo, hollow, L. cavus.] In arch. a hollow member, or round concave moulding, containing the quadrant of a circle, used as an ornament in cornices. The hollow moulding used in the bases between the tori, &c., is also called cavetto.

Cavey, Cavie (kā'vi), n. [D. kevie, G. käfe, käfig, a cage, from L. cavea, a cage.] A hen-coop. 'The chicken cavie.' Burns. [Scotch.]

Cavezon, Cavesson (kav'ez-on, kav'es-on), n. [Fr. cavegon; It. cavezzone, aug. of cavezza, a halter, from L. caput, the head.] A sort of nose-band of iron, leather, or wood, sometimes flat and sometimes hollow or twisted, which is put on the nose of a horse to wring it, and thus to facilitate the breaking of him in. Called also Causson.

Cavia (kā'vi-a), n. [Native Indian name.] A genus of rodent animals, regarded as the type of the family Cavidæ or cavies, and characterized by molars without roots, fore-feet with five toes, hinder with three, and the absence of a tail and clavicles. They are natives of tropical America, the most familiar example of this genus being the well-known guinea-pig.

Caviar, Caviare (kav-i-är' or kav-ē-är'), n. [Fr. caviar, Turk. haviâr. The Rus. name is ikrá.] The roes of certain large fish, prepared and salted. The best is made from the roes of the sterlet, sturgeon, sevruga, and beluga, caught in the lakes or rivers of Russia. From caviare having been regarded as a delicacy too refined to be appreciated by the vulgar taste, we have Shakspere's application of it to a play which the vulgar could not relish—

'Twas caviare to the general. Hamlet.

Cavicorn (kav'i-korn), a. Having the characters of the Cavicornia; belonging to or resembling the Cavicornia.

Cavicornia, Cavicorns (kav-i-kor'ni-a, kav'-i-kornz), n. pl. [L. cavus, hollow, and cornu, a horn.] A family of ruminants, characterized by persistent horns (thus differing from the deer) consisting of a bony core and a horny sheath or case covering the bone, in both sexes or in males only. In various species, as the antelope, the bony nucleus has no internal cavity; in others, as the ox and goat, it is hollow. The first horny case sheds off in the second year, after which the horns become smoother. All the animals of this family form, as appears from their teeth and whole structure, a single natural group, including the antelopes, goats, and oxen. The prong-horn antelope, which renews the horny sheath periodically, is the only exceptional member of the group.

Cavidæ (kav'i-dē), n. pl. The guinea-pig tribe, a family of rodents inhabiting tropical America, where they replace the hares and rabbits of cold climates. The typical genus is Cavia (which see).

Cavil (kav'il), v.i. [O.Fr. caviller, from L. cavillor, to cavil, cavilla, a quibble, trick, shuffle.] To raise captious and frivolous objections; to find fault without good reason: frequently followed by at.

But in the way of bargain, mark ye me
I'll cavil on the ninth part of a hair. Shak.

Except by cavilling at two or three words, it seemed impossible for the Roman Catholics to decline so reasonable a test of loyalty. Hallam.

Cavil† (kav'il), v.t. To receive or treat with objections; to find fault with.

Wilt thou enjoy the good,
Then cavil the conditions? Milton.

Cavil (kav'il), n. A captious or frivolous objection; an exception taken for the sake of argument; captious or specious argument. 'The cavils of prejudice and unbelief.' South.

That's but a cavil; he is old, I young. Shak.

We are to take no counsel with flesh and blood; give ear to no vain cavils, vain sorrows and wishes. Carlyle.

Cavil (kav'il), n. 1. Naut. a kevel (which see).—2. A stone-mason's axe, with a flat face for knocking off projecting angular points, and a pointed peen for reducing a surface to the desired form; a jedding-axe.

Cavillation† (kav-il-lā'shon), n. [L. cavillatio.] The act or practice of cavilling or raising frivolous objections.

I am resolved, when I come to my answer, not to trick my innocency (as I writ to the lords) by cavillations or voidances. Bacon.

Caviller (kav'il-ėr), n. One who cavils; one who is apt to raise captious objections; a captious disputant.

Socrates held all philosophers, cavillers and madmen. Burton.

Cavilling (kav'il-ing), p. and a. Raising frivolous objections; fault-finding. — Captious, Cavilling, Petulant. See under CAPTIOUS.

Cavilling (kav'il-ing), n. The act of raising captious and frivolous objections; an objection of a captious nature. 'Cavillings and menacings.' Jer. Taylor.

Cavillingly (kav'il-ing-li), adv. In a cavilling manner.

Cavillous (kav'il-us), a. Captious; apt to object without good reason; quibbling. Aylife. [Rare and obsolete.]

Cavillously (kav'il-us-li), adv. In a cavillous manner; captiously. 'Cavillously urged.' Milton. [Rare and obsolete.]

Cavillousness (kav'il-us-nes), n. Captiousness; disposition or aptitude to raise frivolous objections. [Rare and obsolete.]

Cavin (kav'in), n. [Fr., from L. cavus, hollow.] Milit. a hollow way or natural hollow, adapted to cover troops and facilitate their approach to a place.

Cavitary (kav'i-ta-ri), a. [L. cavitas, a hollow.] An intestinal worm or entozoon, having an intestinal canal in a distinct abdominal cavity.

Cavitary (kav'i-ta-ri), a. In zool. containing a cavity: specifically applied to a class of entozoic worms; as, the cavitary or nematoid worms. See the noun.

Cavitied (kav'i-tid), a. Having cavities. Prof. Owen.

Cavity (kav'i-ti), n. [Fr. cavité, L. cavitas, from L. cavus, hollow.] 1. A hollow place; a hollow; a void or empty space in a body; an opening: a term applied frequently to the hollow parts of the body; as, the abdominal cavity; the thoracic cavity.—2.† State of being hollow; hollowness. 'The cavity or hollowness of the place.' Goodwin.

Cavolinite (kāv'ō-li-nīt), n. [From Cavolini, a Neapolitan naturalist.] Same as Nephelin.

Cavy (kā'vi), n. An animal of the genus Cavia. See CAVIA.—Patagonian cavy. See MARA.

Caw (kạ), v.i. [Imitative of the sound; comp. Sc. kae, D. kaauw, Dan. kaa, a jackdaw.] To cry like a crow, rook, or raven.

> The building rook'll caw from the windy tall elm-tree,
> And the tufted plover pipe along the fallow lea.
> Tennyson.

Caw (kạ), n. The cry of the rook or crow.

Cawf (kạf), n. Same as Cauf (which see).

Cawk (kạk), n. See CAUK.

Cawky (kạk'i), a. See CAUKY.

Cawquaw (kạ'kwạ), n. The urson, or Canadian porcupine (Erethizon dorsatum), whose spines are often used as ornaments by the Indians. Its chief food consists of living bark, which it strips from the branches as cleanly as if it had been effected by a sharp knife. It commences with the highest branches and eats its way regularly down. One cawquaw will destroy a hundred trees in a single winter.

Caxon (kak'son), n. An old cant term for a wig.

> He had two wigs, both pedantic, but of different omen. The one serene, smiling, fresh powdered, betokening a mild day. The other, an old, discoloured, unkempt, angry caxon, denoting frequent and bloody execution. Lamb.

Caxton (kaks'ton), n. The name applied to any book printed by Caxton, who introduced the art of printing into England. He died 1492. The Caxtons are all in black-letter. The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye, translated from the French of Raoul le Feure, and printed by Caxton at Cologne in 1471, is considered as the earliest specimen of typography in the English language. The Game and Playe of the Chesse, printed by him at Westminster in 1474, is generally regarded as the first work printed in England.

Cay, Kay (kā), n. [Sp. cayo, a rock, a shoal, an islet.] An islet; a range or reef of rocks lying near the surface of the water; a sandbank or shoal barely appearing above water: often improperly termed a Key.

Cayenne Pepper (kī-en' or kā-en' pep'ėr), n. [From Cayenne in South America.] The name given to the powder formed of the dried and ground fruits, and more especially the seeds, of various species of Capsicum, and especially of C. frutescens. It is employed as a condiment to improve the flavour of food, aid digestion, and prevent flatulence. In medicine it is used as a stimulant, and is a valuable gargle for a relaxed throat.

Cayman, Caiman (kā'man), n. [Native Guiana name.] A name applied popularly to the alligator of the West Indies and South America, but properly only to Crocodilus or Caiman palpebrosus and C. trigonatus (Cuv.). See ALLIGATOR.

Caytive† (kā'tiv), a. See CAITIFF.

Caytive (kā'tiv), n. See CAITIVE.

Cazi, Cazio (kạ'zē, kạ'zē-ō), n. See CAUZI.

Cazique (ka-zēk'), n. [Native Indian title.] The name of native princes or head chiefs of Hayti, Cuba, Peru, Mexico, and other regions of America, who were found reigning there when these countries were discovered by the Spaniards. Also applied to the chiefs of independent tribes of Indians in modern times. Written also Cacique, Cazic.

Cazzon (kaz'zon), n. See CASINGS.

Cean (sē'an), a. Of or pertaining to the island of Ceos; specifically applied to the poet Simonides. 'The Cean and the Telan muse.' Byron.

Ceanothus (sē-a-nō'thus), n. [From keanōthos, a name applied by Theophrastus to a kind of thistle.] A genus of prickly shrubs and trees, nat. order Rhamnaceæ. They are natives of North America. Their flowers are in dense masses at the summit of naked flower branches, and the calyx and pedicels are coloured like the petals. The leaves of C. americanus, called New Jersey tea, are sometimes used for tea.

Cease (sēs), v.i. pret. & pp. ceased; ppr. ceasing. [Fr. cesser, L. cesso, cessare, to cease, a freq. from cedere, to yield, to cede. See CEDE.] 1. To stop moving, acting, or speaking; to leave off; to give over; to desist: followed by from before a noun; as, cease from anger, labour, strife, and the like.

> The lives of all who cease from combat, spare.
> Dryden.

2. To come to an end; to terminate; to become extinct; to pass away; as, the wonder ceases; the storm has ceased.

> I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men. Deut. xxxii. 26.
> The poor shall never cease out of the land.
> Deut. xv. 11.

Cease (sēs), v.t. To put a stop to; to put an end to.

> But he, her fears to cease,
> Sent down the meek-eyed Peace. Milton.
> You may sooner, by imagination, quicken or slack a motion, than raise or cease it. Bacon.

Cease† (sēs), n. Extinction.

> The cease of majesty dies not alone. Shak.

Ceaseless (sēs'les), a. 1. Without a stop or pause; incessant; continual; without intermission.

> All these with ceaseless praise his works behold.
> Milton.

2. Endless; enduring for ever; as, the ceaseless joys of heaven. 'Thou, ceaseless lackey to eternity.' Shak. (said of time).

Ceaselessly (sēs'les-li), adv. Incessantly; perpetually. 'Flowers still blooming ceaselessly.' Drummond.

Ceaselessness (sēs'les-nes), n. 1. The state or condition of being ceaseless, or without cessation or intermission; incessancy.—2. The state or condition of enduring for ever; endlessness.

Cebadilla (seb-a-dil'la), n. Same as Cevadilla.

Cebell† (sē-bel'), n. A kind of old English air for the violin, in common time, usually in strains of four bars each, with alternate notes of gravity and acuteness.

Cebidæ (sē'bi-dē), n. pl. [From Cebus, one of the typical genera.] A family of platyrhine monkeys, distinguished by their dentition from the other family, the Hapalidæ, having one molar more on each side of each jaw than the members of the latter family. The family includes the spider-monkeys and sapajous (Cebus, Ateles), the squirrel-monkey (Callithrix, &c.). They are confined to the warmer parts of South America.

Cebipara (sē-bip'a-ra), n. Same as Cebyura.

Cebus (sē'bus), n. [Gr. kēbos, an ape, a monkey.] A genus of platyrhine monkeys with a wide space between the nostrils, including the sapajous. See SAPAJOU.

Cebyura (seb-i-ū'ra), n. The name of a large Brazilian tree, the bark of which is used in decoctions for baths and fomentations in rheumatism of the limbs and cutaneous diseases. Called also Cebipara.

Cecchin (sek-kēn'), n. A coin of Italy and Barbary. See ZECHIN.

Cecidomyia (sē'si-dō-mī"ya), n. [Gr. kēkis, kekidos, a gall-nut, and myia, a fly.] A genus of two-winged flies, of the family Tipulidæ, sub-family Cecidomyidæ. The species are of very small size. Their larvæ often occasion great mischief to the corn crops, from their ravages on the growing plants. The far-famed Hessian-fly (C. destructor) is one of them.

Cecidomyidæ (sē'si-dō-mī"i-dē), n. pl. [See above.] A sub-family of dipterous insects, family Tipulidæ, residing, in their preparatory states, in gall-like excrescences, which the females produce by piercing young sprigs, leaves, &c., with their sharp-pointed ovipositor, and depositing their eggs in the puncture. The genus Cecidomyia is the type. See CECIDOMYIA.

Cecilian (sē-sil'i-an), n. [L. cæcus, blind, from the supposed blindness of the species.] One of a genus of snake-like vertebrates, formerly ranked with serpents. See CECILIA.

Cecils (sē'silz), n. pl. In cookery, minced meat, crumbs of bread, onions, chopped parsley, &c., with seasoning, made up into balls and fried.

Cecity† (sē'si-ti), n. [L. cæcitas, from cæcus, blind.] Blindness.

> There is in them (moles) no cecity, yet more than a cecutiency. Sir T. Browne.

Cecropia (sē-krō'pi-a), n. [After Cecrops, the founder and first king of Athens.] A genus of beautiful South American milky trees, nat. order Artocarpaceæ. C. peltata, or trumpet-wood, is remarkable for its hollow stem and branches, the former being made, by the Indians, into a kind of drum, and the latter into wind-instruments. The light porous wood is used by the Indians for procuring fire by friction. The inner bark is fibrous and strong, and used for cordage. This species yields caoutchouc.

Cecrops (sē'krops), n. [After Cecrops, said to have been the first king of Athens.] A genus of parasitic entomostracous crustaceans, family Caligidæ, found on the gills of the tunny and turbot, and called by fishermen fish-lice, characterized by having a head like a small buckler, with frontal plates, and by only one plate-like appendage on the thorax. They attach themselves to the fishes they infest by a set of sharp-pointed, hooked claws, called foot-jaws, and the mouth is provided with an apparatus by which they puncture the skin and suck the juices.

Cecum (sē'kum), n. See CÆCUM.

Cecutiency† (sē-kū'shi-en-si), n. [L. cæcutire, to be blind, from cæcus, blind.] Cloudiness of sight; partial blindness or tendency to blindness. Sir T. Browne.

Cedar (sē'dėr), n. [L. cedrus, Gr. kedros.] A tree which forms fine woods on all the mountains of Syria and Asia Minor, the Pinus Cedrus of Linnæus, the Cedrus Libani of some other botanists, while by others it is referred to the genus Larix, and by others again along with the larch to the genus Abies. It is an evergreen, grows to a great size, and is remarkable for its durability. Of the famous cedars of Lebanon comparatively few now remain. The most celebrated group is situated not far from the village of Tripoli, at an elevation of about 6000 feet above the sea, the circumference of the twelve largest trees of which varies from about 18 to 47 feet. Its timber was formerly much prized, but in modern times is not regarded as of much value, perhaps from the trees not being of sufficient age. Some fine cedars are met with in England. The name is given also to the deodar, which is indeed regarded by many botanists as a mere variety of the cedar of Lebanon, and which produces excellent timber. It is also applied to many trees which have no relation to the true cedar, as the Bermuda cedar (Juni- perus bermudiana), used for making pencils, the red cedar (J. virginiana), the Honduras, or bastard Barbadoes cedar (Cedrela odorata), and the red cedar of Australia (C. australis). See CEDRUS.

Cedar (sē'dėr), a. Made of cedar; belonging to cedar; as, a cedar cabinet.

Cedar-bird (sē'dėr-bėrd), n. The American waxwing (Ampelis americanus or Bombycilla carolinensis) is so called in the United States from the trees which it chiefly frequents. See WAXWING.

Cedared (sē'dėrd), a. Covered or furnished with cedars; as, a cedared mountain-slope.

Cedar-like (sē'dėr-līk), a. Resembling a cedar.

Cedarn (sē'dėrn), a. Pertaining to the cedar; made of cedar. 'The carven cedarn door.' Tennyson.

Cedar-wood (sē'dėr-wụd), n. A wood of cedar trees, or wood from cedar trees.

> Thou wert born, on a summer morn,
> A mile beneath the cedar-wood. Tennyson.

Cede (sēd), v.t. pret. & pp. ceded; ppr. ceding. [L. cedo, cessum, to retire, to yield, to grant, to give up. 'A modern word; not in Pope's poems. It occurs in Drummond's Travels (1754).' Skeat. This word enters as an element into a great many English words, such as accede, concede, exceed, precede, recede, decease, abscess, antecedent, ancestor, predecessor.] To yield; to surrender; to give up; to resign; to relinquish; as, to cede a fortress, a province, or country by treaty; to cede all claims to a disputed right or territory.

> The people must cede to the government some of their natural rights. Jay.

SYN. To surrender, give up, resign, transfer, deliver.

Cede (sēd), v.i. 1. To yield; to submit.—2. To pass; to be transferred; to fall to; to lapse.

> This fertile globe, this fair domain,
> Had well-nigh ceded to the slothful hands
> Of monks libidinous. Shenstone.

Cedent (sēd'ent), a. Yielding; giving way. [Rare.]

Cedilla (sē-dil'la), n. [Fr. cédille, It. zediglia, a dim. of zeta, the name of z in Greek; because formerly, in order to give c the sound of s, it was customary to write cz; thus, leczon, for modern leçon.] A mark placed under the letter c, especially in French (thus ç), to show that it is to be sounded like s.

Cedrate, Cedrat (sē'drāt, sē'drat), n. [Fr. cédrat.] 1. A variety of the citron-tree.—2. The fruit of the tree. The peel is very thick, and covered with an epidermis which incloses a very fragrant essential oil much prized in perfumery.

Cedrela (sē-drē'la), n. [From Gr. kedrelatē, a cedar fir-tree—kedros, cedar, elatē, fir or pine.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cedrelaceæ, consisting of large trees natives of the tropics of both hemispheres. The bark is fragrant and resinous; that of C. Toona, an East Indian species, is a powerful astringent, and is accounted febrifugal. The bark of C. febrifuga, a native of Java, is said to have a better effect on some of the fevers of India than cinchona. All the species yield good timber, which is sometimes called cedar-wood. C. odorata produces the cedar of Honduras and the West Indies (bastard cedar). C. australis supplies a wood much valued in Australia.

Cedrelaceæ, Cedreleæ (sē-dre-lā'sē-ē, sē-drē'lē-ē), n. pl. [From Cedrela, one of the genera.] The mahogany family, a nat. order of dicotyledonous plants, nearly allied to, if really separate from, the Meliaceæ. They are trees with alternate pinnate leaves, and a woody capsular fruit, opening from the apex into three valves, and having a solid woody axis. They are generally fragrant, aromatic, and tonic. Good and durable timber is supplied by many of the species, as mahogany from Swietenia Mahagoni, Indian satin-wood from Chloroxylon Swietenia, yellow wood of Australia from Oxleya xanthoxyla, and bastard cedar from Cedrela odorata.

Cedrelaceous (sē-dre-lā'shus), a. In bot. pertaining to the nat. order Cedrelaceæ.

Cedrin (sē'drin), n. A neutral crystallizable fat yielded to alcohol by the fruit of the cedron, after it has been exhausted by ether. The crystals resemble silky needles. It is intensely and persistently bitter, and Lewy regards it as the active principle of the fruit.

Cedrine (sē'drīn), a. Belonging to cedar. Johnson.

Cedron (sē'dron), n. A tree (Simaba Cedron), nat. order Simarubaceæ, growing in New Granada, the seeds of which resemble a large bean, and are inclosed in a matty, thick, ovoid drupe of the size of a lemon. They are employed as a remedy in that country for serpent-bites, hydrophobia, and intermittent fever. Their qualities are supposed to depend on the presence of cedrin (which see).

Cedrus (sē'drus), n. [L.; Gr. kedros.] A genus of trees closely allied to the genus Larix, which it resembles in having the leaves growing in tufts or bunches, but from which it is distinguished by being evergreen (the leaves not falling in autumn), and by the form of the cones. It includes only three species or varieties, the C. Libani, or cedar of Lebanon; C. Deodara, or deodar; and C. atlantica, or Mount Atlas cedar. See CEDAR.

Cedule† (sed'ūl), n. [O.Fr. cedule.] A schedule (which see). Cotgrave.

Ceduous† (sed'ū-us), a. [L. cæduus, from cædo, to cut down.] Fit to be felled. Evelyn.

Ceil (sēl), v.t. [O.E. seile, syle, from syle, seele, cyll, a canopy, from Fr. ciel, It. cielo, a canopy, heaven, from L. cælum, heaven, same root as Gr. koilos, hollow, and E. hollow.] To overlay or cover the inner roof of a room or building; to provide with a ceiling.

> And the greater house he ceiled with fir-tree. 2 Chron. iii. 5.

Ceiling (sēl'ing), n. 1. The inside lining or surface of an apartment above; the upper horizontal or curved surface of an apartment opposite the floor, usually finished with plastered work.—Ceiling floor, the joisting and flooring supported by the beams of the roof.—Ceiling joists, small beams to which the ceiling of a room is attached. They are mortised into the sides of the binding joists, nailed to the under side of these joists or suspended from them with straps.—2. The lining or planks on the inside of a ship's frame.

Ceilinged (sēl'ingd), a. Furnished with a ceiling.

Ceinture,† Ceint,† n. A cincture; a girdle.

Celandine (sel'an-dīn), n. [Older forms celadine, celidoine, from O.Fr. celidoine, Fr. chélidoine, from L. chelidonium, Gr. chelidonion, swallow-wort, from chelidōn, a swallow.] 1. A name given to two native plants, the greater celandine and the lesser celandine; the swallow-worts: so called because the plants were believed to flower when the swallow arrived, and to die when it departed. The former is Chelidonium majus, and the latter Ficaria ranunculoides, or pile-wort. The species of Bocconia from the West Indies are called tree-celandines.—2. In chem. a poisonous principle extracted from the swallow-wort (Chelidonium majus).

Celarent (sē-lā'rent), n. In logic, a syllogism in the first figure, comprising a universal negative major premiss, a universal affirmative minor premiss, and a universal negative conclusion: a mnemonic word.

Celastraceæ, Celastrineæ (sē-las-trā'sē-ē, sē-las-trī'nē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. kēlastros, privet or holly.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens, consisting of shrubs or trees, sometimes spinous or climbing, with a beautiful scarlet aril to the seeds, principally found in warm latitudes. Among the members of this order is the Euonymus or spindle-tree, but the majority are not of much economical importance. They have purgative and emetic properties. The order has been divided into two tribes, Euonymeæ, with capsular fruit, and Elæodendreæ, with drupaceous fruit.

Celature† (sē'la-tūr), n. [L. cælatura, from cælo, to engrave or emboss.] 1. The act or art of engraving, chasing, or embossing metals.—2. That which is engraved, &c.

Celebrable† (sel'ē-bra-bl), a. Celebrated. Chaucer.

Celebrant (sel'ē-brant), n. One who celebrates; one who performs a public religious rite; in the R. Cath. Ch. the priest who celebrates mass.

Celebrate (sel'ē-brāt), v.t. pret. & pp. celebrated; ppr. celebrating. [L. celebro, celebratum, to celebrate, from celeber, famous, frequented, populous, which is another form of creber, crowded.] 1. To make known or mention often, especially with honour or praise; to extol; to commend; as, to celebrate the name of the Most High.

> For the grave cannot praise thee; death cannot celebrate thee. Is. xxxviii. 18.
> The Songs of Sion were psalms and pieces of poetry that celebrated the Supreme Being. Addison.
> To celebrate the golden prime
> Of good Haroun Alraschid. Tennyson.

2. To distinguish by any kind of observance, as by solemn rites or by ceremonies of joy and respect; as, to celebrate a birth-day.

> From even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath. Lev. xxiii. 32.

Celebrated (sel'ē-brāt-ed), a. Having celebrity; distinguished; well known; famous.—SYN. Famous, renowned, illustrious, distinguished.

Celebratedness (sel'ē-brāt-ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being celebrated. Sir W. Scott. [Rare.]

Celebrater (sel'ē-brā-tėr), n. One who celebrates. 'A celebrater of your beauty.' Pope.

Celebration (sel-ē-brā'shon), n. The act of celebrating: (a) the act of praising or extolling; renown; honour or distinction bestowed, whether by songs, eulogies, or rites and ceremonies. 'His memory deserving a particular celebration.' Lord Clarendon. (b) The act of performing or observing with appropriate rites or ceremonies; as, the celebration of a marriage or of a religious festival; the celebration of a birth-day or other anniversary.

Celebrious† (sē-lē'bri-us), a. Famous; renowned. Strype.

Celebriously† (sē-lē'bri-us-li), adv. With praise or renown.

Celebriousness† (sē-lē'bri-us-nes), n. Fame; renown.

Celebrity (sē-leb'ri-ti), n. [L. celebritas.] 1. The condition of being celebrated; fame; renown; as, the celebrity of the Duke of Wellington; the celebrity of Homer or of the Iliad. 'An event of great celebrity in the history of astronomy.' Whewell.—2. A person of distinction; as, a celebrity at the bar, or in the church, &c.—3.† Celebration.

> The celebrity of the marriage was performed with great magnificence. Bacon.

Celerer† (sel'ėr-ėr), n. A cellarer.

Celeres (sel'ėr-ēz), n. pl. [L., pl. of celer, swift.] In Rom. antiq. a body of 300 horsemen, formed by Romulus from the wealthier citizens. Their number was afterwards augmented, and they are thought to have been the origin of the equites (which see).

Celeriac (se-leri'-ak), n. A variety of celery. Called also the Turnip-rooted Celery. See CELERY.

Celerity (sē-ler'i-ti), n. [L. celeritas, from celer, swift.] Rapidity of motion; swiftness; quickness; speed: as distinguished from velocity, celerity is now generally applied to the motions or actions of living beings, velocity to inanimate objects; thus we speak of a person or animal moving with celerity, but we say the velocity of sound or light, or of a planet in its orbit. 'No less celerity than that of thought.' Shak. 'Such a celerity in dying.' Shak. 'The celerity of the springy corpuscles of the air.' Boyle.

> Time, with all its celerity, moves slowly to him whose sole employment is to watch its flight. Johnson.

SYN. Quickness, rapidity, speed, speediness, swiftness, fleetness, velocity.

Celery (sel'e-ri), n. [Fr. céleri, It. seleri, from L. selinon, Gr. selinon, parsley.] A plant (Apium graveolens) indigenous to the ditches and marshy places near the sea-coast in England and Ireland, and long cultivated in gardens as a salad and culinary vegetable. There are two varieties in cultivation, viz. red and white stalked, and of these many sub-varieties, as new striped, giant upright, new silver, &c.

Celestial (sē-les'ti-al), a. [O.Fr. celestial, celestiel, L. cælestis, from cælum, heaven.] 1. Heavenly; belonging or relating to heaven; dwelling in heaven; as, celestial spirits; celestial joys. Hence the word often conveys the idea of superior excellence, delight, purity, &c.

> That's a brave god, and bears celestial liquor. Shak.

2. Belonging to the upper regions or visible heaven; as, celestial signs; the celestial globe. 'The twelve celestial signs.' Shak.—Celestial Empire, China, so called because the first emperors are fabled to have been deities.

Celestial (sē-les'ti-al), n. 1. An inhabitant of heaven. 'The unknown celestial.' Pope. 2. A native of China, the so-called Celestial Empire. See under CELESTIAL, a.

Celestialize (sē-les'ti-al-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. celestialized; ppr. celestializing. To make celestial. Quart. Rev. [Rare.]

Celestially (sē-les'ti-al-li), adv. In a celestial or heavenly manner.

Celestialness (sē-les'ti-al-nes), n. The quality of being celestial.

Celestify † (sē-les'ti-fi), v.t. pret. & pp. celestified; ppr. celestifying. To communicate something of a heavenly nature to; to make heavenly. [Rare.]

Heaven but earth celestified, and earth but heaven terrestrified. Sir T. Browne.

Celestin, Celestine (sel'es-tin), n. In mineral. native sulphate of strontian, a mineral so named from its occasional delicate blue colour.

Celestine (sel'es-tin), n. 1. An adherent of Pelagianism, so called from Cælestius, one of the early supporters of Pelagius.—2. One of a religious order, now nearly defunct, so named from Pope Celestine, founder of the order. The brethren rise two hours after midnight to say matins, eat no flesh, fast often, and wear a white gown, a capuche, and a black scapulary.—3. A member of an order of Franciscan hermits now extinct.

Celiac, a. See CŒLIAC.

Celibacy (sel'i-ba-si), n. [L. cœlibatus, a single life, celibacy, from cœlebs, unmarried.] The state of being celibate or unmarried; a single life. It is most frequently if not always used of males or of a voluntary single life. 'The celibacy of the clergy.' Hallam.

No part of the old system had been more detested by the Reformers than the honours paid to celibacy. Macaulay.

Celibatarian † (sel'i-ba-tā'ri-an), n. Same as Celibate.

Celibate (sel'i-bāt), n. [L. cœlibatus. See CELIBACY.] 1. † A single life; celibacy. 'The forced celibate of the English clergy.' Bp. Hall.—2. One who adheres to or practises celibacy; a bachelor, especially a confirmed bachelor.

Celine (sē'lin), a. [Gr. koilia, the belly.] Relating to the belly. [Rare.]

Cell (sel), n. [L. cella, a cell, a small room, a hut, from same root as celare, and Gr. kaluptein, to conceal. Hole and hollow are from the same root.] 1. A small or close apartment, as in a convent or a prison.—2. A small or mean place of residence, such as a cave or hermitage.

In cottages and lowly cells
True piety neglected dwells. Somerville.

3. Eccles. a lesser religious house, especially one subordinate to a greater.—4. In arch. (a) the part of the interior of a temple where the image of a god stood: originally applied in this sense to portions of the temples of the ancient Greeks and Romans, but now applied to the corresponding part of Hindu and other temples. (b) A hollow space between the ribs of a vaulted roof.—5. A small cavity or hollow place: variously Cells.

A, A few cells from the chorda dorsalis of the lamprey. a, Cell-wall; b, cell-contents; c, nucleus; d, nucleolus. B, Multipolar nerve-cell (with many processes), from human spinal cord; c, nucleus and nucleolus. C, An oval nerve-cell. D, Cartilage-cell. E, Hepatic or liver cells. (All magnified.) F, Pigment or colour cell, from skin of frog.

applied; as, the cells of the brain; the cells of a honey-comb; the cells of an anther or a capsule.—6. In biol. (a) most commonly a membranous bag with more or less fluid contents, and almost always a nucleus; as, epithelial and fat cells. (b) A small soft semi-solid mass of matter with no definite boundary-wall, but most frequently appearing to have a small granular substance in the centre, supposed by some to be a nucleus, but now more generally believed to be merely an appearance due to imperfection in the glass of the microscope through which it is viewed. Lymph and chyle corpuscles are examples of this second kind. In these the substance composing the enveloping membrane and its contents is homogeneous, being a compound of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, the covering being at first simply an infinitely fine indurated outer layer, but thickening as the cell becomes older at the expense of the interior or growing part. To this substance the name of protoplasm has been given, and it is now believed to be the starting-point of all animal and vegetable organisms. See PROTOPLASM.—7. In elect. a single jar, bath, or division of a compound vessel, containing a couple of plates, generally copper and zinc, united to their opposites or to each other, usually by a wire. See Galvanic battery under GALVANIC.

Cell (sel), v.t. To shut up in a cell; to place in a cell. [Rare.]

Myself a recluse from the world
And celled underground. Warner.

Cella (sel'la), n. In arch. same as Cell, 4 (a).

Cellar (sel'lėr), n. [L. cellarium. See CELL.] A room in a house or other building, either wholly or partly under ground, not adapted for habitation but for lumber, storage purposes, coals, wine, and such like, and having openings into the outer air for ventilation only. In some of the overcrowded parts of our large towns, however, cellars are converted into habitations for people of the lowest classes.

Cellar (sel'lėr), a. Of or pertaining to a cell; as, cellar walls.

Cellarage (sel'lėr-āj), n. 1. The space occupied by cellars; a cellar or cellars collectively.

Come on—you hear this fellow in the cellarage—
Consent to swear. Shak.

2. Charge for storage in a cellar.

Cellar-book (sel'lėr-bųk), n. A book containing details regarding the wines or other liquors received into and given out from a cellar; a book kept by a butler showing the state of the wine-cellar generally.

Here he checked the housekeeper's account, and overhauled the butler's cellar-book. Thackeray.

Cellarer (sel'lėr-ėr), n. 1. An officer in a monastery who has the care of the cellar, or the charge of procuring and keeping the provisions; also, an officer in chapters, who has the care of the tenporals, and particularly of distributing bread, wine, and money to canons on account of their attendance in the choir.—2. Same as Cellarman.—3. One who keeps wine or spirit cellars; a spirit-dealer.

Cellaret (sel-lėr-et'), n. [Dim. of cellar.] A case of cabinet work for holding bottles of liquors. Thackeray.

Cellaring (sel'lėr-ing), n. 1. A range or system of cellars; cellarage.

Ah! how blessed should I be to live with you in a retired and peaceful cottage, situated in a delightful sporting country, with attached and detached offices, roomy cellaring, and commodious attics. Morton.

2. The act or practice of storing goods in cellars.

Cellarino (chel-la-rē'nō), n. [It.] In arch. the part of a capital below the annulets.

Cellarist (sel'lėr-ist), n. Same as Cellarer.

Cellarman (sel'lėr-man), n. A person who is employed in a wine-cellar; a cellarer; a butler.

Cellarous (sel'lėr-us), a. Belonging to or connected with a cellar; subterranean; excavated. 'Certain cellarous steps.' Dickens. [Rare.]

Celled (seld), a. Furnished with a cell or cells: commonly used as the terminal element of a compound adjective; as, single-celled.

Cellepora, Cellipora (sel-lep'o-ra, sel-lip'o-ra), n. [L. cella, a cell, and porus, Gr. poros, a passage.] A genus of corals belonging to the class Polyzoa, composed of minute distinct cells arranged like fringes in longitudinal rows.

Cellerer † (sel'lėr-ėr), n. A cellarer.

Celliferous (sel-lif'ėr-us), a. [L. cella, a cell, and fero, to bear.] Bearing or producing cells.

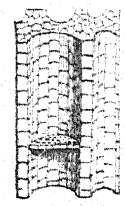
Cellular (sel'lū-lėr), a. [L. cellula, a little cell.] 1. Consisting of cells, or containing cells.—Cellular membrane or tissue, in animal bodies, is composed of an infinite number of minute cells communicating with each other. It invests every fibre, and seems to be the medium of connection between all parts of the body.—Cellular tissue, in bot. The tissues composing a plant are all modified cells, but this term is confined to that composed of elementary vesicles or cells without woody or vascular tissues. See CELL and TISSUE.—2. Pertaining to or resembling cells; as, a cellular appearance.—Cellular theory, the physiological theory that derives all vegetable and animal tissues from the union and metamorphosis of primitive cells.



Cellular Tissue in Plants.

Cellular (sel'lū-lėr), n. In bot. a plant having no spiral vessels. Lindley.

Cellulares (sel-lū-lā'rēz), n. pl. A name given to one of the grand divisions of the vegetable kingdom, consisting of cryptogamic plants the tissues of which are cellular without fibres or vessels. See VASCULARES.

Cellulated (sel'lū-lāt-ed), a. Having a cellular structure.

Cellule (sel'lūl), n. [L. cellula.] A little cell.

Cellulicolæ (sel-lū-lik'ō-lē), n. pl. [L. cellula, a little cell, and colo, to inhabit.] A family of spiders, order Pulmonaria, which form their nests beneath the bark of trees, in the cavities of stones and rocks, &c.

Celluliferous (sel-lū-lif'ėr-us), a. [L. cellula, a little cell, and fero, to bear.] Bearing or producing little cells.

Celluline (sel'lū-lin), n. and a. Same as Cellulose, n. and a.

Celluloid (sel'ū-loid), n. An artificial substance now much used as a substitute for ivory, bone, coral, horn, &c. See SUPP.

Cellulose (sel'lū-lōs), a. [From L. cellula, a little cell.] Containing cells.

Cellulose (sel'lū-lōs), n. In bot. the substance of which the permanent cell-membranes of plants are always composed. Its composition is $C_6H_{10}O_5$. It is in many respects allied to starch, and is changed into starch by heat, sulphuric acid, or caustic potash: when iodine is applied to it it becomes yellow, unless sulphuric acid be added, when, by its conversion into starch, a blue colour is produced. Cellulose has been also detected in the tunics of ascidia and other invertebrate animals.

Cellulosic (sel-lū-lō'sik), a. Of or relating to cellulose; produced by or made of cellulose. 'Cellulosic fermentation.' Nineteenth Century.

Celosia (sē-lō'zi-a), n. [Gr. kēlos, dry, burned, from the burned-like appearance of the flowers of some species.] A genus of, for the most part, tropical plants, nat. order Amaranthaceæ. The cockscomb so common in cultivation is C. cristata, but the cultivated form of this plant, with a broad flattened stem and a terminal crest, is very unlike the plant in its natural form, being a monstrosity formed by the union or fasciation of the stems or branches.

Celostomy (sē-los'tō-mi), n. [Gr. koilos, hollow, and stoma, the mouth.] The act of speaking with a hollow voice.

Celotomy (sē-lot'o-mi), n. [Gr. kēle, a tumour, and tomē, a cutting.] In surg. a term for the operation of removing the stricture in strangulated hernia by cutting.

Celsia (sel'si-a), n. [From Celsius, a professor at Upsala and friend of Linnæus.] A genus of ornamental plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. Several species are cultivated in this country as greenhouse plants.

Celsitude † (sel'si-tūd), n. [L. celsitudo.] Height; elevation. Chaucer.

Celt (selt), n. [L. Celtæ, Gr. Keltoi, Keltai, the Celts; supposed to be taken from W. celtiad, one who lives in a covert, an inhabitant of the wood or forest, celt, a covert or shade, from celu (L. celo), to conceal; Gael. ceiltach, an inhabitant of the forest.] One of the earliest Aryan inhabitants of the south and west of Europe. Of the Celts there are two great branches, viz. the Gad- helic, comprising the Highlanders of Scotland, the Irish, and Manx; and the Cymric, comprising the Welsh and Bretons. Celtic is now spoken most largely in Wales, while a certain number of persons in the Highlands of Scotland and in Ireland also speak it. [The word with its derivatives is frequently written with an initial K—Kelt, Keltic, &c.]

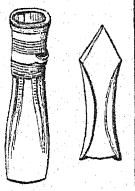
Celt (selt), n. [L.L. celtis, a chisel, a celt.] In archæol. an implement, sometimes made of stone and sometimes of metal, found in ancient tumuli and barrows of the Celtic period in Great Britain, Ireland, and on the continent of Europe. Some have supposed the celt to be a weapon of offence, while others have contended that it is a tool which served the united purpose of an axe and a chisel.—Socket or pot celt, a celt with a hole at one end into which the shaft was fitted.



Celts.

Celtiberian (selt-i-bē'ri-an), a. [L. Celtiberi, compounded of Celtæ, Celts, and Iberi, Iberians, the supposed original inhabitants of Spain.] Pertaining to Celtiberia and its inhabitants, the Celtiberi, an ancient people of Spain.

Celtiberian (selt-i-bē'ri-an), n. An inhabitant of Celtiberia (the name given in ancient times to Central Spain).

Celtic (selt'ik), a. [See CELT.] Pertaining to the Celts, or to their language; as, Celtic tribes; Celtic tongues; Celtic customs; Celtic origin.

Celtic (selt'ik), n. The language or group of dialects spoken by the Celts, including Welsh, Armoric or Breton, Irish, Gaelic, and Manx.

Celticism (selt'i-sizm), n. 1. The manners and customs of the Celts.—2. A Celtic expression or mode of expression.

Celtis (selt'is), n. [L., an African species of lotus.] A genus of trees of several species, nat. order Ulmaceæ, with simple and generally serrated leaves like those of the common nettle, but not stinging; the nettle-trees. C. australis, a native of the north of Africa and south of Europe, is a handsome tree, growing to the height of 30 or 40 feet, with hard, durable wood, capable of a fine polish and much used to ornament highroads in Italy and south of France. C. occidentalis, a North American tree, grows to the height of 60 to 80 feet. C. orientalis and C. aculeata are low spreading trees of inferior interest.

Celtish (selt'ish), a. Celtic; Keltic. [Rare.]

Celtism (selt'izm), n. See CELTICISM.

Celto-Roman (selt'ō-rō-man), a. Relating to the mixed population of Celts and Romans in South and West Europe.

Celured,† p. and a. [Norm. celure, a coverlet; same origin as ceiling.] Ceiled; canopied.

Cement (sē-ment'), n. [O.Fr. cement, Fr. ciment; L. cæmentum, signifying primarily a rough stone as it comes from the quarry, then the chips that fly off from it in hewing, which, in the case of marble, were made into cement; contr. from cædimentum, from cædo, to cut.] 1. Any glutinous or other substance capable of uniting bodies in close cohesion, as mortar, glue, &c.; specifically, in building, a stronger kind of mortar than that which is ordinarily used, consisting of those hydraulic limes which contain silica and therefore set quickly. Cements are variously composed, according to the nature of the surfaces to which they are applied and their exposure to heat or moisture. Hydraulic or water cements harden under water and consolidate almost immediately on being mixed. Of this kind are the Roman and Portland cements.—2. Fig. bond of union; that which unites persons firmly together.

> Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul!
> Sweet'ner of life! and solder of society. Blair.

3. In anat. the tissue forming the outer crust of the fangs or root of the teeth; crusta petrosa. See CRUSTA.

Cement (sē-ment'), v.t. 1. To unite by cement or the application of glutinous substances, by mortar which hardens, or other matter that produces cohesion of bodies.—2. Fig. to unite firmly or closely; as, to cement all parts of the community; to cement friendship.

> The fear of us may cement their divisions. Shak.

Cement (sē-ment'), v.i. To unite or become solid; to unite and cohere.

Cenotaph of Burns, Banks of Doon.

empty tomb erected in honour of some deceased person; a sepulchral monument erected to one who is buried elsewhere. 'A cenotaph in Westminster abbey.' Macaulay.

> A cenotaph his name and title kept. Dryden.
> I silently laugh at my own cenotaph. Shelley.

Cenotaphy (sen'ō-taf-i), n. Same as Cenotaph.

Cense† (sens), n. [L. census, a valuation, registering, tax, from censēre, to value, count, enrol, tax; whence also censor, censure.] 1. A public rate or tax.

> The cense or rates of Christendom are raised since ten times, yea, twenty times told. Bacon.

2. Census.

> The number of graffs which sprung at one time in and about her walls, in a famous cense that was made, amounted to above three millions. Howell.

3. Condition; rank. 'A man whose state and cense you are familiar with.' B. Jonson.

Cense (sens), v.t. pret. & pp. censed; ppr. censing. [Fr. encenser. See INCENSE.] To perfume with odours from burning gums and spices. [Rare.]

> The Salii sing, and cense his altars round. Dryden.

Cense (sens), v.i. To scatter incense. 'Censing about the altar.' B. Jonson. [Rare.]

Censer (sen'sėr), n. [A shortened form for incenser; Fr. encensoir. See INCENSE.] A vase or pan in which incense is burned; a vessel for burning and wafting incense. Among the Jews the censer was a kind of chafing-dish, covered by a dome and suspended by a chain, used to offer perfumes in sacrifices. Censers, called also thuribles, are still used in the Roman Catholic Church at mass, vespers, and other offices, as well as in some Anglican and other churches. They are of various forms. (See THURIBLE.) In Shakspere's time the term was applied to a bottle perforated and ornamented at the top, used for sprinkling perfume, or to a pan for burning any odoriferous substance.

> Here's snip and nip and cut and slish and slash,
> Like to a censer in a barber's shop. Shak.

Cension† (sen'shon), n. [L. censio. See CENSE, n.] A rate, tax, or assessment. Bp. Hall.

Censor (sen'sėr), n. [L. censor. See CENSE, n.] 1. An officer in ancient Rome whose business was to draw up a register of the citizens and the amount of their property, for the purposes of taxation; to keep watch over the morals of the citizens, for which purpose they had power to censure vice and immorality by inflicting a public mark of ignominy on the offender; and to superintend the finance administration and the keeping up of public buildings.—2. One who is empowered to examine all manuscripts and books before they are published, and to see that they contain nothing heretical or immoral. See under CENSORSHIP.—3. One who censures, blames, or reproves; one who is given to censure; one who is addicted to perpetual fault-finding. 'Ill-natured censors of the present age.' Roscommon.

> Let me tell my youthful censor that the necessities of that time required something very different from what others then suggested. Burke.

4. In schools, a pupil appointed to keep the register of all who attend, to mark those who are absent each day on meeting, to report faults, &c.

Censorial (sen-sō'ri-al), a. 1. Belonging to a censor or to the correction of public morals; as, the censorial office in ancient Rome.—2. Full of censure; censorious; severe. 'Censorial declamation.' Warton. 'A censorial verity.' Lamb.

Censorian (sen-sō'ri-an), a. Same as Censorial. 'The censorian power.' Bacon.

Censorious (sen-sō'ri-us), a. 1. Addicted to censure; apt to blame or condemn; severe in making remarks on others or on their writings or manners; as, a censorious critic.

> A dogmatical spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbours. Watts.

2. Implying or expressing censure; as, censorious remarks.

Censoriously (sen-sō'ri-us-li), adv. In a censorious manner.

Censoriousness (sen-sō'ri-us-nes), n. The quality of being censorious; disposition to blame and condemn; the habit of censuring or reproaching.

> Censoriousness and sinister interpretation of things, all cross and distasteful humours render the conversation of men grievous and uneasy. Tillotson.

Censorship (sen'sėr-ship), n. The office or dignity of a censor; the time during which a censor holds his office.—Censorship of the press, a regulation which formerly prevailed in most countries of Europe, and is still in force in many, according to which printed books, manuscripts, pamphlets, and newspapers are examined by persons appointed for the purpose, who are empowered to prevent publication if they see sufficient reason; that is, if they find anything in such books or writings obnoxious to the prevailing political or religious systems.

Censual (sen'shö-al), a. [L. censualis.] Relating to or containing a census. 'A censual roll or book.' Sir W. Temple.

Censurable (sen'shör-a-bl), a. Worthy of censure; blamable; culpable; reprehensible; as, a censurable person; censurable conduct or writings.

Censurableness (sen'shör-a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being censurable or blamable; fitness to be censured.

This, and divers others, are alike in their censurableness by the unskilful, be it divinity, physic, poetry. Whitlock.

Censurably (sen'shör-a-bli), adv. In a censurable manner; in a manner worthy of blame.

Censure (sen'shör), n. [L. censura, an opinion or judgment; Fr. censure; from L. censeo, to value, to estimate. See CENSE, n.] 1.† Judgment; opinion; criticism.

Take each man's censure but reserve thy judgment. Shak.

2. Judicial sentence; a condemnatory judgment.

To you, lord governor,
Remains the censure of this hellish villain;
The time, the place, the torture. Shak.

An ecclesiastical censure is a sentence of condemnation or penalty inflicted on a member of a church for misconduct, by which he is deprived of the communion of the church or prohibited from executing the sacerdotal office.—3. The act of blaming or finding fault and condemning as wrong; expression of blame or disapprobation; fault-finding; condemnation; animadversion.

In minds unstrengthened by right culture there is a perverse belief that they can only raise themselves by lowering whatever stands beside them. Therefore, when all the world turned critical before the schoolmaster was well abroad, censure, that simply meant expression of opinion, with a sense even of some admitted value to be ascertained, came to mean chiefly or only condemnation. Prof. Morley.

SYN. Blame, reproof, condemnation, reprobation, disapproval, disapprobation, reprehension, animadversion, reprimand, reflection, dispraise, abuse.

Censure (sen'shör), v. t. pret. & pp. censured; ppr. censuring. 1.† To estimate; to reckon; to regard as; to judge.

Should I say more, you well might censure me
(What yet I never was) a flatterer. Beau. & Fl.

2. To condemn by a judicial sentence, as in ecclesiastical affairs.—3. To find fault with and condemn as wrong; to blame; to express disapprobation of; as, to censure a man, or his manners, or his writings.

We laugh at vanity oftener than we censure pride. Buckminster.

To reprove, to rebuke, to reprimand, to censure, to remonstrate, to expostulate, to reproach. To reprove is to admonish with disapprobation. To rebuke is now used in nearly the same sense, but is a stronger term. To reprimand is to reprove officially and by one in authority. To censure is to express an unfavourable opinion. It implies equality between the parties, and is less personal than the previous terms. To remonstrate and to expostulate are acts more argumentative and imply more of advice than either reprove or censure. They also apply only to acts now taking place or about to take place, while censure applies only to what is past. Men may remonstrate with a superior; they generally expostulate with equals or inferiors. To reproach is to give vent to our feelings: it is applicable to all grades, and it often applies when we attribute to another faults he does not admit. Angus.

Censure† (sen'shör), v. i. To pass an opinion, especially a severe opinion; to judge.

'Tis a passing shame,
That I, unworthy body as I am,
Should censure thus on lovely gentlemen. Shak.

Censurer (sen'shör-ér), n. One who censures.

A statesman, who is possessed of real merit, should look upon his political censurers with the same neglect that a good writer regards his critics. Addison.

Census (sen'sus), n. [L., from censeo. See CENSE, n.] 1. In Rom. antiq. a registered statement of the particulars of a person's property for taxation purposes; an enumeration and register of the Roman citizens and their property; the drawing up of such a register.—2. In modern times, an enumeration of the inhabitants of a state or part of it, taken by order of its legislature. The first actual enumeration of the people of England and Scotland was made in 1801. Subsequently a census has been taken every ten years. In Ireland the earliest census was taken in 1813, since which time a census has been taken concurrently with that of Great Britain.

Census-paper (sen'sus-pā-pér), n. A schedule or form left with the head of each house on each occasion of taking the census, to be filled up with the names, ages, occupations, &c., of all the inmates, and given up to the enumerators on their calling for it on the statutory day.

Cent (sent), n. [Contr. of L. centum, a hundred, which is of cognate origin with E. hundred (which see).] 1. A hundred, commonly used with per; as, ten per cent, that is, in the proportion of ten to the hundred.

For lucky rhymes to him were scrip and share,
And mellow metres more than cent per cent.
Tennyson.

2. In various countries a coin equal to the hundredth part of that which forms the monetary unit. In the United States of America, a copper coin whose value is the hundredth part of a dollar, or about the same as a halfpenny of our money.—3. An old game at cards, so called because 100 was the game. Nares.

Centage (sen'tāj), n. Rate by the cent or hundred; percentage. [Rare.]

Cental (sen'tal), n. A weight of 100 lbs. proposed to be generally adopted in the trade and commerce of this country, and legalized by an act of 1878.

Centaur (sen'tar), n. [L. centaurus; Gr. kentauros, lit. bull-killer; the Centaurs were probably a race that hunted wild cattle and lived almost constantly on horseback.] 1. In Greek myth. a fabulous being supposed to be half man and half horse. The earliest notices of them in Greek literature, however, merely represent them as a race of wild and savage men inhabiting the mountains and forests of Thessaly, and it is not till later times that they appear as in the cut. The Centaur Cheiron was distinguished for his knowledge of medicine.—2. Part of a southern constellation, in form of a centaur, usually joined with the Wolf, containing thirty-five stars; the Archer.

Centaurea (sen-tą'rē-a), n. [L. centaurea, Gr. kentaurié, kentauris, kentaurion, after the Centaur Cheiron, because it is said to have cured a wound in his foot.] A very extensive genus of herbaceous plants, nat. order Compositæ. The species are annual or perennial herbs, with alternate leaves and single heads, all the florets of which are tubular. They are found in Europe, Western Asia, and North Africa. The annuals, C. cyanus (corn blue-bottle), C. moschata (purple or white sultan), and C. suaveolens (yellow sultan), are sometimes cultivated in gardens, but the species in general are of very little importance, and many are mere weeds, such as C. nigra and C. Scabiosa, the knapweed of our meadows and pastures.

Centauree,† n. A herb, the centaury. Chaucer.

Centaurize (sen'tar-īz), v. i. To perform the acts of, or to be like a centaur; to be a man, yet act like a brute. Young. [Rare.]

Centaury (sen'ta-ri), n. [See CENTAUREA.] The popular name of various plants. The lesser centaury is a species of Erythræa (which see).

Centenaar (sen'te-nār), n. The Amsterdam hundredweight or quintal, equal to nearly 109 lbs. See CENTNER.

Centenarian (sen-te-nā'ri-an), n. A person a hundred years old or upwards.

Centenarian (sen-te-nā'ri-an), a. Of or pertaining to a centenary or centenarian.

Centenarious (sen-te-nā'ri-us), a. Belonging to a hundred years. [Rare.]

Centenary (sen'te-na-ri), n. [L centenarius, from centum, a hundred; but from the meanings it would appear that the word was often regarded as from centum, and annus, a year.] 1. What consists of or comprehends a hundred; the space of a hundred years. 'One inch of decrease in the growth of men for every centenary.' Hakewill.—2. The commemoration of any event, as the birth of a great man, which occurred a hundred years before; as, the centenary of Burns; the centenary of Sir Walter Scott. [This is now the usual meaning.]

Centenary (sen'te-na-ri), a. Relating to or consisting of a hundred; relating to a hundred years; as, a centenary festival or celebration. 'Centenary solemnities which occurred but once in a hundred years.' Fuller.

Centenier† (sen-te-nēr'), n. One of a division containing a hundred.

They are an hundred chosen out of every town and village, and thereon were termed centeniers or centurians. Time's Storehouse.

Centennial (sen-ten'ni-al), a. [L. centum, a hundred, and annus, a year.] 1. Consisting of or lasting a hundred years; as, a centennial epoch.—2. Aged a hundred years.

That opened through long lines
Of sacred Ilex and centennial pines. Longfellow.

3. Happening every hundred years; as, a centennial celebration.

Centennial (sen-ten'ni-al), n. The commemoration or celebration of any event which occurred a hundred years before; as, the centennial of American independence.

Centennially (sen-ten'ni-al-li), adv. Once in every hundred years; as, to celebrate an event centennially.

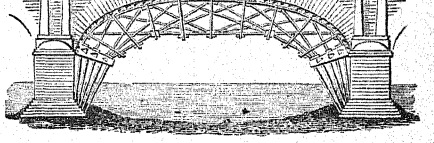
Center (sen'tėr). See CENTRE.

Centering (sen'tėr-ing), n. The framing of timber by which the arch of a bridge or other structure is supported during its erection. The same name is given to the woodwork or framing on which any vaulted work is constructed. It is sometimes termed Centre. The centering of a bridge has to keep the stones or voussoirs in position till they are keyed in, that is, fixed by the insertion of the requisite number of stones in the centre, and its construction is a matter demanding the utmost care of the architect or builder. The removal of the wooden framework is called striking the centering, and on this being done what is called the settlement of the arch takes place, the central voussoirs moving a little and those in the flanks rising.



Centering, Waterloo Bridge, London.

Centesimal (sen-tes'i-mal), a. [L. centesimus, from centum, a hundred.] 1. Hundredth; as, a centesimal part.—2. By the hundred. 'Centesimal increase.' Sir T. Browne.

Centesimal (sen-tes'i-mal), n. In arith. hundredth part; the next step of progression after decimal.

The neglect of a few centesimals in the side of the cube would bring it to an equality with the cube of a foot. Arbuthnot.

Centesimation (sen-tes'i-mā"shon), n. [See CENTESIMAL, a.] A military punishment for desertion, mutiny, or the like, where one person in a hundred is selected for execution; similar to decimation, or the punishment of one in ten. Jer. Taylor.

Centesimo (sen-tez'ē-mō; It. pron. chen-tez'ē-mō), n. 1. In the money system of Italy, the hundredth part of a lira, which is equal to the French franc in value.—2. An Argentine money of account. It is the hundredth part of a dollar, that is of 4*s.*

Centesm† (sent'ezm), n. [L. centesimus.] The hundredth part of a thing, as of an integer. Bailey.

Centetes (sen-tē'tēz), n. A genus of mammals of the family Talpidæ, very nearly allied to the hedgehogs; the tenracs. See TENRAC.

Centiare (sen'ti-ār; Fr. pron. säñ-tyär), n. A square metre; the hundredth part of the French are, and equal to 1·19 square yards.

Centicipitous (sen-ti-sip'i-tus), a. [L. centiceps, centicipitis; from centum, a hundred, and caput, the head.] Having a hundred heads. [Rare.]

Centifidous (sen-tif'i-dus), a. [L. centum, a hundred, and findo, to cleave or split.] Divided into a hundred parts. [Rare.]

Centifolious (sen-ti-fō'li-us), a. [L. centifolius, from centum, a hundred, and folium, a leaf.] Having a hundred leaves. Johnson.

Centigrade (sen'ti-grād), a. [L. centum, a hundred, and gradus, a degree.] 1. Consisting of a hundred degrees; graduated into a hundred divisions or equal parts.—Centigrade thermometer, a thermometer introduced by Celsius, which divides the interval between the freezing and boiling points of water into 100 degrees, while in Fahrenheit's thermometer the same interval is divided into 180 degrees; hence 1 centigrade degree is equivalent to 1⅘ degrees of Fahrenheit. The zero of the centigrade thermometer also is placed at the freezing-point, while in Fahrenheit's it is 32 degrees below it. See THERMOMETER.—2. Pertaining to the scale which is divided into a hundred degrees; as, a centigrade degree.

Centigramme (sen'ti-gram or säñ-tē-gram), n. [Fr., from L. centum, a hundred, and gramme.] A French measure of weight, the hundredth part of a gramme. See GRAMME.

Centilitre (sen-ti-lī'tr or säñ-tē-lē-tr), n. [Fr., from L. centum, and Fr. litre.] In French liquid measure, the hundredth part of a litre, a little more than ⅗ths of a cubic inch.

Centiloquy† (sen-til'ō-kwi), n. [L. centum, a hundred, and loquor, to speak.] A hundred sayings; as, the Centiloquy of Ptolemæus, a work containing a hundred aphorisms. Burton.

Centime (sen-tēm' or säñ-tēm), n. [Fr.] The hundredth part of a franc.

Centimetre (sen-ti-mē'tr or säñ-tē-mā-tr), n. [Fr. centimètre, from L. centum, a hundred, and Gr. metron, measure.] A French measure of length, the hundredth part of a metre, rather more than $\frac{3.9}{10.0}$ths of an inch, English measure.

Centinel† (sen'ti-nel), n. A sentinel.

Centinody† (sen-tin'ō-di), n. [O.Fr. centinodie, from L. centum, a hundred, and nodus, a knot.] Knotgrass.

Centiped, Centipede (sen'ti-ped, sen'ti-pēd), n. [L. centipeda—centum, a hundred, and pes, pedis, a foot.] A term applied to various insects having many feet, all belonging to the order Cheilopoda of the class Myriapoda. The most common British centipede, Lithobius forficatus, is quite harmless, but those of tropical countries belonging to the genus Scolopendra inflict severe and often dangerous bites. They sometimes grow to a foot in length.

Centipedal (sen'ti-pē-dal), a. Pertaining or belonging to the centipedes.

Centistere (sen'ti-stēr or säñ-tē-stār), n. [Fr. centistère.] The hundredth part of the French stere, equal to ·353 cubic foot.

Centner (sent'nėr), n. [G., from L. centenarius, from centum, a hundred.] 1. In metal. and assaying, a weight divisible first into a hundred parts and then into smaller parts. The metallurgists use a weight divided into a hundred equal parts, each one pound; the whole they call a centner; the pound is divided into thirty-two parts or half-ounces, the half-ounce into two quarters, and each of these into two drams. But the assayers use different weights. With them a centner is one dram, to which the other parts are proportioned.—2. A common name on the Continent for a hundredweight. In Switzerland it is equal to 110 lbs.; in Austria, 110½; in Sweden, 112·06; in Germany, 110·25.

Cento (sen'tō), n. pl. Centos (sen'tōz). [L. cento, primarily cloth made up of patches, patch-work, and then a poem made up of selections from different poems.] In music and literature, a composition made up of selections from the works of various authors or composers; a pasticcio.

It is quilted, as it were, out of shreds of divers poets, such as scholars call a cento. Camden.

Centoculated (sen-tok'ū-lāt-ed), a. [L. centum, a hundred, and oculus, an eye.] Having a hundred eyes.

Centoist (sen'tō-ist), n. One who compiles centos; a compiler. Edin. Rev. [Rare.]

Centone (chen-tō'nā), n. [It.] A musical cento.

Centonism (sen'tō-nizm), n. The act of constructing centos, or making compilations from various authors. Hallam. [Rare.]

Centonizing (sen'tō-nīz-ing), n. The act of compiling; specifically, in music, the act of patching up or adapting songs to music already known. [Rare.]

Central (sen'tral), a. [L. centralis.] Relating or pertaining to the centre; placed in the centre or middle; constituting or containing the centre; originating or proceeding from the centre.

The ducal palace of Venice contains the three elements in exactly equal proportions—the Roman, Lombard, and Arab. It is the central building of the world. Ruskin.

—Central eclipse, an annular eclipse (which see). It is so named because the centres of the sun and moon appear to coincide.—Central forces, in mech. the powers which cause a moving body to tend toward or recede from the centre of motion. That which causes the revolving body to tend towards the centre of motion is called the centripetal force, and that which causes it to recede from the centre is called the centrifugal force.

Centralisation (sen'tral-iz-ā"shon), n. Same as Centralization.

Centralise (sen'tral-īz), v.t. Same as Centralize.

Centralism (sen'tral-izm), n. The quality of being central; the combination of several parts into one whole; centralization.

Centralist (sen'tral-ist), n. One who promotes centralization, or bringing all the departments of state to one centre.

Centrality (sen-tral'i-ti), n. The state of being central.

Centralization (sen'tral-iz-ā"shon), n. The act of centralizing or bringing to one centre; as, the centralization of power in the hands of a ministry; the centralization of commerce in a city.

Centralize (sen'tral-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. centralized; ppr. centralizing. To draw to a central point; to bring to a centre; to render central; to concentrate in some particular part as an actual or conventional centre: generally applied to the process of transferring local administration to the court or capital.

Centrally (sen'tral-li), adv. In a central manner or position; with regard to the centre; as, to be centrally situated.

Centralness (sen'tral-nes), n. The state of being central; centrality.

Centranthus (sen-tran'thus), n. [Gr. kentron, a spur, and anthos, a flower.] A genus of plants, nat. order Valerianaceæ, distinguished from the true valerian by having a spur to the corolla and a single stamen. The species are perennial smooth herbs, with white or red flowers. C. ruber (spur-valerian) is a sweet-scented plant naturalized in the south of England and Ireland in chalk-pits and on old walls. Some of the species are grown in gardens, and are elegant border-flowers.

Centration† (sen-trā'shon), n. Tendency to the centre. Dr. H. More.

Centre (sen'tėr), n. [Fr., from L. centrum, Gr. kentron, a goad, spur, or point, from kenteo, to prick, because in describing a circle with a pair of compasses the fixed leg makes a mark or hole in the centre.] 1. A point in a line, figure, or body equally distant from the extremities; the middle point or place.—2. The middle or central object. In an army, the body of troops occupying the place in the line between the wings. In a fleet, the division between the van and rear of the line of battle, and between the weather division and lee in the order of sailing.—3. A point of concentration; the nucleus around which or into which things are collected; as, a centre of attraction; a centre of power. 'The centre of a world's desire.' Tennyson.

These institutions collected all authority into one centre, kings, nobles, and people. J. Adams.

It is to expect that we may then descend again into the moral and spiritual world, because its source and centre are the same as those of the material creation. Whewell.

4. In arch. see CENTERING.—5. In ball-practice, (a) the part of a target next the bull's-eye. (b) A shot striking the target within the circle or square next the bull's-eye.—6. One of the points of the lathe-spindles on which the object to be turned is placed; or one of two similar points for holding an object to be operated on by some other machine, as a planing-machine, and enabling the object to be turned round on its axis.—7. Among the Fenians, the title given to the leaders of the organization. The head centre is at the head of the whole, and he has under him various subordinates named district, &c., centres.—8. In the French and some other legislative assemblies the title is given to the members with moderate views intermediate between the right and left.—Centre of attraction of a body, is that point into which, if all its matter were collected, its action upon any remote particle would be the same as before; or the point to which bodies tend in consequence of the action of gravity.—Centre of a bastion, a point in the middle of the gorge of a bastion, whence the capital line commences, and is generally at the angle of the inner polygon.—Centre of a conic section, that point which bisects any diameter, or that point in which all the diameters intersect each other.—Centre of conversion, a point in a body about which it turns, or tends to turn, when a force is applied to any part of it, as when a bar of iron lies horizontally, and is struck at one end perpendicularly to its length, one point in the rod remains at rest, as a centre about which all the other points tend to revolve.—Centre of a curve of the higher kind, the point where two diameters concur.—Centre of displacement, the mean centre of that part of a ship which is immersed in the water. It is also called the Centre of Cavity, and sometimes the Centre of Immersion, or Centre of Buoyancy.—Centres of a door, the two pivots on which the door turns.—Centre of equilibrium, is the same in respect to bodies immersed in a fluid, as the centre of gravity to bodies in free space. See EQUILIBRIUM.—Centre of equilibrium of a system of bodies, a point such that if the system were suspended from it, the whole would remain in equilibrium.—Centre of friction, that point on which anything turns when put in rapid and independent motion; thus the extremity of the peg round which a top spins is the centre of friction.—Centre of gravity, in mech. the point about which all the parts of a body exactly balance each other, and which being supported the whole body will remain at rest though acted on by gravity; or that point in the interior of a body so situated that any plane whatever that passes through it divides the body into two parts, of which the weights are exactly equal. Also called Centre of Mass. See GRAVITY.—Centre of gyration, the point at which, if the whole mass of a revolving body were collected, the rotatory effect would remain unaltered.—Centre of inertia, that point in a body which is so situated that the force requisite for producing motion in the body, or bringing it to rest, is equivalent to a single force applied at this point. It is the same with the centre of gravity.—Centre of magnitude, that point in a body which is equally distant from all the similar external parts of it. In the regular solids this point coincides with the centre of gravity.—Centre of motion, the point which remains at rest while all the other parts of a body move round it.—Centre of oscillation, the point of a body suspended by an axis, at which, if all the matter were concentrated, the oscillations would be performed in the same time.—Centre of percussion, the point at which, if a moving body encountered an immovable obstacle, the motion would be arrested without producing any strain on the axis. It coincides with the centre of oscillation when the percutient body moves about a fixed point; and with the centre of gravity when the body moves in a straight line.—Centre of pressure. See under PRESSURE.

Centre (sen'tėr), v.t. pret. & pp. centred; ppr. centring. 1. To place on a centre; to fix on a central point.—2. To collect to a point.

Thy joys are centred all in me alone. Prior.

Centre (sen'tėr), v.i. 1. To be placed in a centre or in the middle.

As God in heaven
Is centre, yet extends to all; so thou (earth),
Centring, receivest from all those orbs. Milton.

2. To be collected to one point; to be concentrated or united in one. 'Our hopes must centre on ourselves alone.' Dryden.

Life's choicest blessings centre all in home. Cowper.

Centre-bit (sen'tėr-bit), n. A carpenter's tool for boring large circular holes, which turns on an axis or central point when in operation. See BIT and STOCK.

Centre-board (sen'tėr-bōrd), n. A movable keel used especially in American yachts, capable of being raised and lowered in a well extending longitudinally amidships, passing through a slit in the vessel's bottom.

Centre-drill (sen'tėr-dril), n. A small drill used for making a short hole in the ends of a shaft about to be turned, for the entrance of the lathe centres.

Centreity† (sen-trē'i-ti), n. Power of attraction towards a centre.

> In everything compost,
> Each part of the essence its centreity
> Keeps to itself; it shrinks not to a nullity.
> Dr. H. More.

Centre-piece (sen'tėr-pēs), n. An ornament intended to be placed in the middle or centre of something, as of a table or mantelshelf, or between other ornaments.

> He might have missed a centre-piece or a choice wine-cooler. Dickens.

Centre-pin (sen'tėr-pin), n. The pivot on which the compass needle oscillates.

Centre-punch (sen'tėr-punsh), n. A tool consisting of a small piece of steel with a hardened point at one end.

Centre-rail (sen'tėr-rāl), n. In railways and tramways, a rail placed between the ordinary rails in a track.

Centre-second (sen'tėr-sek-und), a. A term applied to a watch, clock, or other timepiece in which the seconds-hand is mounted on the central arbor, and completes its revolutions in one minute.

Centric (sen'trik), n. In anc. astron. a circle the centre of which was the same as that of the earth. 'The sphere with centric and eccentric scribbled o'er.' Milton.

Centric, Centrical (sen'trik, sen'trik-al), a. Placed in the centre or middle; central.

Centrically (sen'trik-al-li), adv. In a central position; centrally.

Centricalness (sen'trik-al-nes), n. Situation in the centre.

Centricity (sen-tris'i-ti), n. The state of being centric.

Centrifugal (sen-trif'ū-gal), a. [L. centrum, a centre, and fugio, to flee.] 1. Tending to recede from the centre. The centrifugal force of a body is that force by which any body moving round another body in a curve, tends at every point to fly off from the axis of its motion in a tangent to the curve; thus the moon in revolving round the earth has a tendency, in every point of her orbit, to fly off in the direction of a tangent to that point, and the same is true of all the planets.

> Centrifugal force is not a distinct force in a strict sense, but only a certain result of the first law of motion measured by the portion of centripetal force which counteracts it. Whewell.

2. Acting by or depending on centrifugal force or action; as, a centrifugal pump; a centrifugal machine, a name given to many machines for raising water, ventilating mines, drying yarn, clothes, sugar, &c. In these drying machines the material is placed in a hollow cylinder with a reticulated periphery of wire-gauze, and being rotated very rapidly the water (or in the case of sugar the molasses) flies off by centrifugal action. Hence centrifugal sugar, a trade term for sugar thus prepared.—3. In bot. expanding first at the summit and later at the base, as a flower.—Centrifugal inflorescence is that kind of inflorescence in which the terminal or central flower is the first to expand, as in a true cyme. The elder and valerian furnish examples. It is also called Definite Inflorescence.

Centring (sen'tr-ing), n. See CENTERING.

Centripetal (sen-trip'e-tal), a. [L. centrum, a centre, and peto, to move toward.] 1. Tending toward the centre.—Centripetal force is that force which draws a body towards a centre, and thereby acts as a counterpoise to the centrifugal force in circular motion. Gravity is a centripetal force preventing the planets from flying off in a tangent, as the stone does from the sling.—2. Progressing by changes from the exterior of an object to its centre; as, the centripetal calcification of a bone. Owen. Specifically, in bot. expanding first at the base of the inflorescence, and later at the summit, as a flower.—Centripetal inflorescence is that kind of inflorescence in which the lower or outer flower is the first to expand, as in spikes, racemes, umbels, corymbs, and heads. The laburnum, hemlock, onion, and daisy are examples. It is also called Indefinite Inflorescence.

Centripetency (sen-trip'e-ten-si), n. Tendency to the centre. [Rare.]

Centriscidæ (sen-tris'i-dē), n. pl. A name given by some zoologists to the Fistularidæ, a family of fishes, from Centriscus, its typical genus.

Centriscus (sen-tris'kus), n. [Gr. kentriskos, dim. of kentron, a goad or point.] A genus of teleostean fishes, of the section Acanthopterygii and family Fistularidæ. To this genus belongs the bellows-fish, trumpet-fish, or sea-snipe of our own coast.

Centrobaric (sen-trō-bar'ik), a. [Gr. kentron, the centre, and baros, weight.] Relating to the centre of gravity or method of finding it.—Centrobaric method, a method of measuring the extent of a surface or contents of a solid by means of certain relations subsisting between the centre of inertia (or gravity) of a line and surfaces generated by it, and between the centre of inertia of a plane surface and solids generated by it.

Centrolinead, Centrolineal (sen-trō-lin'ē-ad, sen-trō-lin'ē-al), n. [L. centrum, a centre, and linea, a line.] An instrument for drawing lines converging towards a point, though the point be inaccessible.

Centrolineal (sen-trō-lin'ē-al), a. A term applied to lines converging to a centre.

Centrolineal, n. See CENTROLINEAD.

Centropus (sen'trō-pus), n. [Gr. kentron, a spur, and pous, a foot.] A genus of scansorial birds, natives of New South Wales, belonging to the cuckoo family, so called from the long spur-like claw of the inner toe; the pheasant cuckoo. They bring up their own young.

Centrum (sen'trum), n. [L.] A centre. In zool. the body of a vertebra; the solid piece to which the arches and processes are attached.

Centry† (sen'tri), n. A sentry or sentinel. 'The centry's box.' Gay.

Centumvir (sen-tum'vir), n. pl. Centumviri (sen-tum'vi-rī). [L. centum, a hundred, and vir, a man.] One of a hundred and five judges in ancient Rome appointed to decide common causes among the people.

Centumviral (sen-tum'vi-ral), a. Pertaining to the centumvirs.

Centumvirate (sen-tum'vi-rāt), n. The office or dignity of the centumviri.

Centunculus (sen-tung'kū-lus), n. [L., dim. of cento, patch-work; also, the name of a small plant growing on cultivated ground.] A genus of plants, nat. order Primulaceæ, containing a few species of very small annual herbs. The many-seeded capsule bursts transversely, as in the allied pimpernel. C. minimus (bastard-pimpernel, chaff-weed) is a native of Britain. It is a very minute plant, with a branched stem, and flowers of a pale rose or white colour. It grows in damp sandy and gravelly places.

Centuple (sen'tū-pl), a. [Fr. centuple, from L. centuplus—centum, a hundred, and root of plica, a fold.] A hundred-fold.

> I wish his strength were centuple. Massinger.

Centuple (sen'tū-pl), v.t. pret. & pp. centupled; ppr. centupling. To multiply a hundred-fold.

> Though my wants
> Were centupled upon myself, I could be patient.
> Beau. & Fl.

Centuplicate (sen-tū'pli-kāt), v.t. pret. & pp. centuplicated; ppr. centuplicating. [L. centum, a hundred, and plicatus, folded.] To make a hundred-fold; to repeat a hundred times.

> I performed the civilities you enjoined me to your friends, who return you the like centuplicated. Howell.

Centurial (sen-tū'ri-al), a. [L. centurialis.] Relating to, or occurring once in, a century or a hundred years; centennial; as, a centurial sermon. [Rare.]

Centuriate† (sen-tū'ri-āt), v.t. [L. centurio, to divide into hundreds or companies.] To divide into hundreds.

Centuriator, Centurist (sen-tū'ri-ā-tėr, sen'tū-rist), n. [Fr. centuriateur, from L. centuria, a century, or from centurio, to divide into hundreds.] An historian or chronologist who distinguishes time into centuries, as in the Universal Church History of Magdeburg. [Rare.]

> The centuriators of Magdeburg were the first that discovered this grand imposture. Ayliffe.

Centurion (sen-tū'ri-on), n. [L. centurio, from centum, a hundred.] In Rom. antiq. a military officer who commanded a century or company of infantry consisting of a hundred men. The centurion answered to the captain in modern armies.

Centurist, n. See CENTURIATOR.

Century (sen'tū-ri), n. [L. centuria, from centum, a hundred.] 1. In a general sense, a hundred; anything consisting of a hundred in number.

> With wild wood-leaves and weeds I ha' strew'd his grave,
> And on it said a century of pray'rs. Shak.

2. In Rom. antiq. a division of the people for the purpose of electing magistrates and enacting laws, the people voting by centuries; also, a company consisting of a hundred men.—3. A period of a hundred years. This is the most common signification of the word; and as we begin our modern computation of time from the incarnation of Christ the word is generally applied to some term of a hundred years subsequent to that event; as, the first or second century, or the tenth century. If we intend to apply the word to a different era we use an explanatory adjunct; as, the third century before the Christian era, or after the deluge.—Centuries of Magdeburg, a title given to an ecclesiastical history, arranged in thirteen centuries, compiled by a number of Protestants at Magdeburg.—Century plant, a name sometimes given to the American aloe, which was formerly supposed to flower only once in a century.

Ceorl,† n. [A. Sax. See CHURL.] A freeman of the lower rank among the Anglo-Saxons.

Cepa (sē'pa), n. [L., an onion.] The common onion, the Allium Cepa of botanists.

Cepevorous (sē-pev'ō-rus), a. [L. cepa, an onion, and voro, to devour.] Feeding on onions. [Rare.]

Cephaëlis (se-fā'el-is), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and eilō, to compress.] An extensive genus of plants, nat. order Rubiaceæ, consisting of shrubs or perennial herbs, natives of tropical regions, chiefly in America. Their flowers grow in close heads, surrounded by involucrating bracts, which are sometimes richly coloured. The most interesting species is Cephaëlis Ipecacuanha, which yields the ipecacuanha root of the druggists. It is found in shady woods in Brazil. The root is the part employed in medicine, and has a characteristic ringed structure. It is used as an emetic, its efficacy depending on a white alkaline principle contained in it called emetin.

Cephalalgic (sef-a-lal'jik), a. Relating to cephalalgy or headache.

Cephalalgic (sef-a-lal'jik), n. A medicine for the headache.

Cephalalgy (sef'al-al-ji), n. [Gr. kephalalgia—kephalē, the head, and algos, pain.] Headache.

Cephalanthera (sef'al-an-thē''ra), n. [Gr. kephalē, a head, and anthēra, anther, from the position of the anthers.] A genus of plants, nat. order Orchidaceæ. The plants have tough fibrous roots and broad ribbed leaves. The genus is closely allied to Epicactis, from which, however, it differs in the anthers being terminal and the ovary twisted. There are three British species known by the common name of helleborine.

Cephalanthium (sef-a-lan'thi-um), n. [See CEPHALANTHUS.] In bot. the head or capitate inflorescence of a composite plant.

Cephalanthus (sef-a-lan'thus), n. [Gr. kephalē, a head, and anthos, a flower, flowers disposed in heads being a characteristic of this order.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rubiaceæ. The species are shrubs, with small white flowers densely aggregated in spherical peduncled heads. The best known species is C. occidentalis (the button-bush of North America).

Cephalaspis (sef-a-las'pis), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and aspis, a shield.] A genus of fossil ganoid fishes, occurring in the old red sandstone. The head is very large, bears a close resemblance to the shape of a saddler's knife, and is protected by a large buckler-shaped plate, which is prolonged into a point on either side.

Cephalata (sef-a-lā'ta), n. pl. [Gr. kephalē, the head.] A division of molluscs which have a distinct head, with eyes, as the gasteropods, pteropods, cuttle-fishes; otherwise called Cephalophora.

Cephalate (sef'al-āt), n. A mollusc of the division Cephalata.

Cephalic (sē-fal'ik), a. [Gr. kephalikos, from kephalē, the head.] Pertaining to the head; as, cephalic medicines, remedies for disorders in the head.—Cephalic vein, the vein which runs along the arm, so named because the ancients used to open it for disorders of the head.

Cephalic (sē-fal'ik), n. A medicine for headache or other disorder in the head.

Cephalisation, Cephalization (sef'al-i-zā"shon), n. In biol. a term proposed by Professor Dana, of America, to denote a tendency in the development of animals towards a localization of important parts in the neighbourhood of the head; as, by the transfer of locomotive members or limbs to the head (in the Cephalopoda, for example).

Cephalistic (sef-a-list'ik), a. Pertaining to the head. [Rare.]

> There is a cranium, the cephalistic head-quarters of sensation. Is. Taylor.

Cephalitis (sef-a-lī'tis), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and term. -itis, signifying inflammation.] Inflammation of the brain.

Cephalization, n. See CEPHALISATION.

Cephalo-branchiate (sef'a-lō-brang"ki-āt), a. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and branchia, gills.] In zool. a term applied to a section of the Annelida which have tufts of external gills placed on the head.

Cephalo-extractor (sef'a-lō-eks-trakt"ėr), n. An instrument to extract a fœtus by clasping the head.

Cephalography (sef-a-log'ra-fi), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and graphē, description.] A description of the head. Dunglison.

Cephaloid (sef'a-loid), a. [Gr. kephalē, head, eidos, form.] Shaped like the head; spherical.

Cephalology (sef-a-lol'o-ji), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and logos, a discourse.] A treatise on the head.

Cephalolophus (sef-a-lol'ō-fus), n. See CEPHALOPHUS.

Cephalometer (sef-a-lom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the fœtal head during parturition. E. H. Knight.

Cephalophora (sef-a-lof'ō-ra), n. pl. See CEPHALATA.

Cephalophus (sē-fal'ō-fus), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and lophos, a crest—from tuft of hair on the head.] An African genus of antelopes with short conical horns, set far back, large muffle, and a crested crown, including the duyker-bok or impoon (C. mergens), much hunted in South Africa. Its flesh makes capital soup, and the skin is cut into thongs for the long wagon-whips. Its height at the shoulder is about 21 inches. The rhoode-bok, red-buck, or Natal bush-buck (C. natalensis), and the blue-buck (C. pygmæa)—the former about 2 feet high, and the latter scarcely more than 1 foot—both South African, are members of this genus. Written also Cephalolophus, and erroneously Cephalopus.

Cephalopod (sef'a-lō-pod or sē-fal'ō-pod), a. Belonging or pertaining to the Cephalopoda.

Cephalopod, Cephalopode (sef'a-lō-pod, sef'a-lō-pōd, or sē-fal'ō-pod, sē-fal'ō-pōd), n. A member of the class Cephalopoda (which see). Written also Cephalopodan.

Cephalopoda (sef-a-lop'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. kephalē, a head, and pous, podos, a foot.] A class of the mollusca, the highest in organization in that division of the animal kingdom, characterized by having the organs of prehension and locomotion, called tentacles or arms, attached to the head. They are divided into two sections, Tetrabranchiata and Dibranchiata. The nautilus, and the fossil genera Orthoceras, Ammonites, Goniatites, &c., belong to the Tetrabranchiata, in which the animal has an external shell. The dibranchiate group includes the argonaut, the octopus or eight-armed cuttle-fishes, and the ten-armed forms, as the calamaries, the fossil belemnites, &c. The shell is in all these internal, in some rudimentary. The fossil Cephalopoda are multitudinous.

Cephalopodan (sef-a-lop'o-dan), n. A mollusc of the class Cephalopoda; a cephalopod.

Cephalopodic, Cephalopodous (sef'al-ō-pod"ik, sef-a-lop'o-dus), a. Relating to the cephalopoda.

Cephaloptera (sef-a-lop'tėr-a), n. A genus of cartilaginous fishes, the type of the subfamily Cephalopteridæ (which see).

Cephalopteridæ (sef'a-lop-tėr"i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kephalē, the head, pteron, a feather, a wing, and eidos, likeness.] A sub-family of cartilaginous fishes of the ray family, of which the genus Cephaloptera is the type, distinguished from all other rays by a pair of little fins which stand out from the head like horns; fin-headed rays or horned rays. Only one species (C. Giorna) has been found near the British coasts. Some of the members of the family attain an almost incredible size, one having been taken at Messina weighing upwards of half a ton.

Cephalote, Cephalot (sef'a-lōt, sef'a-lot), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head.] A name given to a yellow elastic fatty substance, insoluble in alcohol, but soluble in ether, which is obtained from the brain. According to some authorities it is a mixture of the cerebrates of potassium and sodium, with traces of olein and oleo-phosphoric acid. Called also Cerebrot.

Cephalo-thorax (sef'a-lō-thō"raks), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and thōrax, the thorax.] The anterior division of the body in crustaceans, spiders, scorpions, &c., which consists of the head and thorax blended together.

Cephalotome (sef'a-lō-tōm), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and tomos, cutting.] An instrument for cutting into the fœtal head to assist its forcible contraction and facilitate delivery.

Cephalotomy (sef-a-lot'o-mi), n. 1. In anat. the dissection or opening of the head.—2. In surg. the act or practice of operating with the cephalotome.

Cephalotribe (sef'a-lō-trīb), n. [Gr. kephalē, the head, and tribō, to bruise.] An obstetrical instrument for crushing the head of the infant in the womb in cases of difficult delivery. It consists of a strong forceps, with a powerful screw, by which the blades are forcibly pressed together so as to crush anything that is between them.

Cephalotus (sef-a-lō'tus), n. [Gr. kephalōtos, headed.] A genus of plants of a somewhat anomalous structure, included in the nat. order Saxifrageæ. Only one species is known, C. follicularis (the Australian pitcher-plant), a curious herb with radical leaves, some of which are elliptic and entire, but others are altered into pitchers with a thickened notched rim, closed with lids like the true pitcher-plants (Nepenthes). The small white flowers are borne on a long spike. The generic name is due to the presence of headed hairs in the interior of the calyx.

Cephalous (sef'a-lus), a. Having a head; specifically, a term applied to the Cephalata, a division of molluscs including the univalves.

Cepheus (sē'fe-us), n. [In class. myth. the name of a king of Ethiopia, and husband of Cassiopeia, placed among the stars after his death.] 1. In astron. a constellation in the northern hemisphere, surrounded by Cassiopeia, Ursa Major, Draco, and Cygnus. It contains thirty-five stars.—2. One of the moss mites, family Oribatidæ.

Cepola (sep'ō-la), n. [L.L., dim. from cepa, an onion, from its resemblance to the leaves of the plant.] A genus of fishes of the section Acanthopterygii. A species of this genus found on the British coast is known in England by the names of the red band-fish and red snake-fish.

Cepolidæ (sē-pol'i-dē), n. pl. [See CEPOLA.] Ribbon-fishes; band-fishes. A family of acanthopterygian fishes, characterized by an elongated and much compressed body, a very long dorsal fin often running the whole length of the back, the caudal fin when present being, however, always distinct from it, and by small cycloid scales. They are found, though not abundantly, in most seas, and some attain a large size, the Gymnetrus Banksii, a British species, being sometimes 12 feet long. Also called Tænioideæ.

Cepphic (sef'ik), a. [Gr. kepphos, a light sea-bird; metaphorically, a feather-brained simpleton, a booby.] Very light; trifling. [Rare.]

Ceraceous (sē-rā'shus), a. [L. ceraceus, waxy.] In bot. waxy: a term applied to bodies which have the texture and colour of new wax, as the pollen masses of particular kinds of orchis.

Cerago (sē-rā'go), n. [L. cera, wax.] Bee-bread; a substance consisting chiefly of the pollen of flowers, used by bees for aliment.

Cerain (sē'ra-in), n. [L. cera, wax.] A name given to that portion of bees'-wax which is sparingly soluble in alcohol, and is not saponified by potash.

Cerambycidæ (sē-ram-bis'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kerambyx, a horned beetle.] A family of coleopterous insects of the section Longicornes. They are common in all parts of the globe, but especially in hot climates. The musk-beetle (Aromia moschata) belongs to this family.

Cerambyx (sē-ram'biks), n. A Linnæan genus of coleopterous insects, including the musk-beetle, now subdivided into other genera. See CERAMBYCIDÆ.

Ceramiaceæ (sē-rā'mi-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. keramion, a jar or pitcher, from shape of the capsules.] The rose-tangles, a natural order of cellular sea-weeds (Algæ), consisting of thread-like jointed plants of a red or brown-red hue. The spores are in masses in transparent membranous sacs, and the tetraspores are external.

Ceramic (se-ram'ik), a. [Gr. keramikos, from keramos, potter's-clay, a piece of pottery.] Of or belonging to the fictile arts or pottery; pertaining to the manufacture of porcelain and earthenware; as, the ceramic art.

Ceramidium (sėr-a-mid'i-um), n. [Gr. keramion, a pitcher.] One of the conical or ovate capsules of the Ceramiaceæ or rose-spored algæ. They generally open by a terminal pore for the escape of the spores.

Ceraphron (sėr'a-fron), n. [Origin uncertain.] A genus of minute parasitic insects, family Proctotrupidæ, some of which prey on insects destructive to plants. C. destructor lays its eggs in the pupæ of the Hessian-fly, which it destroys. It is calculated that not more than one in ten escapes the vigilance of these little enemies. C. Carpenteri deposits its eggs in the female plant-lice.

Cerapus (sėr'a-pus), n. [L. cera, wax, and Gr. pous, a foot.] The caddis-shrimp, a genus of amphipodous crustaceans, which live in a tube, somewhat as the caddis-worm among insects.

Cerasin, Cerasine (sėr'a-sin), n. [L. cerasus, a cherry-tree.] A kind of gum which exudes from the cherry and plum tree. It is distinguished from gum-arabic by being insoluble in cold water.

Cerasinous (se-ras'i-nus), a. 1. Pertaining to or containing cerasin.—2. Cherry-coloured; deep red. [Rare.]

Cerasite (sėr'a-sīt), n. [L. cerasus, a cherry.] 1. A cherry-like petrifaction.—2. The native muriate of lead. Dana.

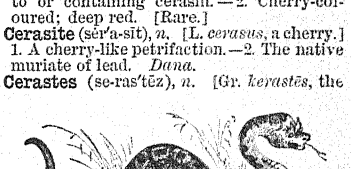
Cerastes (se-ras'tēz), n. [Gr. kerastēs, the horned viper, from keras, a horn.] A genus of African vipers, remarkable for their fatal venom, and for two little horns formed by the scales above the eyes. Hence they have received the name of horned vipers. The tail is very distinct from the body. C. vulgaris is the horned viper of Northern Africa, a species known to the ancients. There are several other species.



Cerastes horridus.

Cerastium (se-ras'ti-um), n. [From Gr. keras, a horn, from the horn-shaped capsules of many of the species.] Mouse-ear chickweed, a genus of plants, nat. order Caryophyllaceæ, consisting of many pubescent herbs with small leaves and white flowers, forming common weeds in all temperate and cold regions. Nine species are found in Britain.

Cerastium aquaticum (Water Mouse-ear Chickweed).

Cerasus (sēr'a-sus), n. [L., a cherry-tree.] The cherry genus, a genus of hardy trees, nat. order Rosaceæ, or rather a section of the genus Prunus, from which it is distinguished only by its leaves when young being folded instead of being rolled up. See CHERRY.

Cerate (sē'rāt), n. [L. ceratum, from cera, wax.] A thick kind of ointment composed of wax, lard, or oil, with other ingredients, applied externally in various diseases.

Cerated (sē'rāt-ed), a. [L. ceratus.] Covered with wax.

Ceratine (sēr'a-tīn), a. [Gr. keratinēs, the name of a sophistical dilemma celebrated among ancient logicians, from keras, keratos, a horn.] Sophistical; fallaciously subtle. [Rare.]

Ceratite (sēr'a-tīt), n. A member of the genus Ceratites.

Ceratites podosus.

Ceratites (sēr-a-tī'tēz), n. [Gr. keras, a horn.] A genus of fossil Ammonitidæ, allied to the ammonites, in which the descending lobes terminate in a few small denticulations pointing upwards, the septa being plain. They are characteristic of the trias.

Ceratium (sē-rā'shi-um), n. [Gr. keration, dim. of keras, a horn.] In bot. a one-celled, many-seeded, superior linear fruit, differing from the siliqua or silique in the lobes of the stigma being alternate with the placenta, not opposite.

Ceratobranchial (sēr'a-tō-brang"ki-al), a. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and branchia, the gills.] A term applied to the lower of the two bony pieces which form the branchial arches in fishes.

Ceratocele (sēr'a-tō-sēl), n. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and kēlē, a tumour.] A term for a hernia of the cornea of the eye, consisting in a protrusion of the transparent cornea, or rather of the membrane of the aqueous humour, through an opening in the cornea.

Ceratodus (sē-rat'ō-dus), n. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and odous, tooth.] A fish in the Queensland rivers, allied to the lepidosiren. It is from 3 to 6 feet long, and the body is covered with large cycloid scales. The Ceratodus is the native 'salmon' or Barramunda of Australian rivers.

Cerato-glossus (sēr'a-tō-glos'sus), n. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and glōssa, the tongue.] In anat. a muscle running from one of the cornua of the os-hyoïdes to the tongue.

Cerato-hyal (sēr'a-tō-hī"al), a. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and hyoïdes, the hyoid bone.] In anat. pertaining to the lower and larger of the two principal parts of the cornua of the hyoid bone.

Ceratonia (sēr-a-tō'ni-a), n. [L.L. ceratonius, horned, from Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, from the horn-shaped pods.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, remarkable from the flowers wanting the corolla. The only species is C. Siliqua (St. John's-bread or carob-tree), a native of the countries skirting the Mediterranean. The pods, often called locust-beans, are supposed by some to have been the food of St. John in the wilderness. They contain a sweet nutritious pulp, and are extensively used for feeding animals, and are sometimes seen in fruiterers' shops.

Ceratophyllaceæ (sēr'a-tō-fil-lā"sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and phyllon, a leaf.] A natural order of plants, containing a single genus with only one species, Ceratophyllum demersum (hornwort). It is a slender aquatic herb, with whorled, finely dissected rigid leaves, and small solitary monœcious flowers, without calyx or corolla. It is common in pools or slow streams over a great part of the world.

Ceratospongiæ (sēr'a-tō-spon"ji-ē), n. pl. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and sponggos, a sponge.] An order of sponges, distinguished by their soft flexible skeleton of horn, of which the bath sponge is the type.

Ceratostoma (sēr-a-tos'tō-ma), n. [Gr. keras, keratos, a horn, and stoma, a mouth.] In bot. a term applied to a perithecium, or case containing the reproductive organs of certain fungi when its neck is elongated.

Ceraunics (se-rą'niks), n. [Gr. keraunos, thunder.] That branch of natural philosophy which investigates the laws and describes the phenomena of heat and electricity. [Rare.]

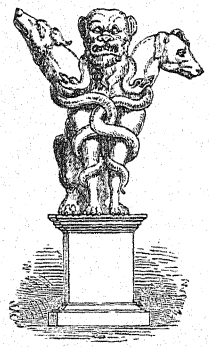
Ceraunite (se-rą'nīt), n. [Gr. keraunos, thunder.] A thunder-stone; a belemnite.

Ceraunoscope (se-rą'nō-skōp), n. [Gr. keraunos, thunder, and skopeō, to behold.] An apparatus or instrument used in the mysteries of the ancients to imitate thunder and lightning.

Cerbera (sėr'bėr-a), n. [After the fabled dog Cerberus, from their poisonous qualities.] A genus of plants, nat. order Apocynaceæ, natives of the East Indies, South America, &c. They are possessed of poisonous properties. A Brazilian species is called Ahouai (which see).

Cerberean, Cerberian (sėr-bē'rē-an, sėr-bē'ri-an), a. Relating to Cerberus. 'Wide Cerberian mouths.' Milton.

Cerberus (sėr'bėr-us), n. [L.] 1. In class. myth. the watch-dog of the infernal regions, the offspring of the giant Typhaon and the serpent-woman Echidna. He is usually represented with three heads, with the tail of a serpent, and with serpents round his neck. 2. A sub-genus of serpents (ophidians), which have nearly the whole of the head covered with small scales. The length is about 3½ feet.



Cerberus—antique bronze.

Cerca (sėr'ka), n. pl. Cercæ (sėr'sē). [Gr. kerkos, a tail.] In entom. one of the feelers projecting from the hind parts of the bodies of some insects.

Cercaria (sėr-kā'ri-a), n. [Gr. kerkos, a tail.] In zool. the second larval stage of a trematode worm or fluke. It is a tadpole-like body, which becomes encysted, and gives rise to the sexual forms. The cycle is—1, Distomum, parent form; 2, Redia; 3, Cercaria; 4, Encysted Cercaria; 5, Distomum. The larvæ are chiefly found in the bodies of molluscs, the adults in vertebrated animals, as birds.

Cercarian (sėr-kā'ri-an), n. A worm or fluke in its second larval stage. See CERCARIA.

Cercariiform (sėr-kā'ri-i-form), a. Having the form of or resembling a cercaria.

Cercis (sėr'sis), n. [Gr. kerkis, a shuttlecock, the name given to the plant by Theophrastus.] A small genus of trees or shrubs, nat. order Leguminosæ. They have simple, broad, generally two-lobed leaves, and rose-coloured flowers. The best known species is C. Siliquastrum, the Judas-tree, so called from the tradition that it was upon a plant of it, near Jerusalem, that Judas Iscariot hanged himself. It is common on the shores of Asia Minor and in all the East.

Cercle,† n. A circle. Chaucer.

Cercle,† v.t. To encircle; to surround. Chaucer.

Cercocebus (sėr-kō-sē'bus), n. [Gr. kerkos, a tail, and kēbos, an ape.] A genus of Asiatic and African monkeys, with large cheek-pouches, large callosities, and long tails, included by some zoologists in the genus Cercopithecus. It includes the malbrouk, or dog-tailed monkey, the mangabys, and the green monkeys. They are frequent inmates of our menageries, and are remarkable for their wonderful suppleness and agility, and their power of twisting themselves into strange contortions.

Cercolabes (sėr-kol'a-bēz), n. [Gr. kerkos, the tail, and lambanō, to seize.] A genus of Brazilian porcupines, remarkable for their long prehensile tails. The C. prehensilis is known as the coendoo.

Cercoleptidæ (sėr-kō-lep'ti-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kerkos, a tail, and leptos, delicate.] The kinkajous, a small tropical American group of mammals, allied to the Ursidæ. See KINKAJOU.

Cercopidæ (sėr-kop'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kerkōps, one of a fabled race of men resembling monkeys, and eidos, resemblance.] A subfamily of homopterous insects, family Cicadellina, remarkable for their grotesque forms. It includes the cuckoo-spits and frog-hoppers. The exotic species are very numerous, and often very showy.

Cercopithecus (sėr'kō-pi-thē"kus), n. [Gr. kerkos, a tail, and pithēkos, an ape.] A genus of long-tailed monkeys found in Africa, with large thumbs, callosities, and cheek-pouches. They are very active, and are often prettily variegated. Among them is the Mona monkey.

Cerdocyon (sėr-dos'i-on), n. [Gr. kerdos, gain, in the pl. wiles, and kyōn, a dog = cunning dog.] A South American genus of the dog tribe, intermediate between the true dogs and the foxes. Some have a singular propensity to steal and secrete brilliant objects. The natives of the colder parts of South America have a rich fur.—Also called Urocyon.

Cere (sēr), n. [L. cera, wax: from its appearance. Compare the G. name wachshaut, lit. wax-skin.] In ornith. the term applied to the space destitute of feathers generally observed at the base of the bill in birds, and which is supposed to exercise a tactile sense.

> The hen-bird had a black cere. Gilbert White.

Cere (sēr), v.t. pret. & pp. cered; ppr. cering. [L. cera, wax.] To wax, or cover with wax, or with a cerecloth.

> Then was the bodye bowelled (i.e. disembowelled), embawmed and cered. Hall.

Cereal (sē'rē-al), a. [From Ceres, the goddess of corn.] Pertaining to edible grain, as wheat, rye, barley, oats, maize, rice, millet. —Cereal grasses, grasses which produce corn.

Cereal (sē'rē-al), n. A general term for a grain plant, such as wheat, oats, barley, and other grasses, cultivated by agriculturists for the sake of their seed as food.

Cerealia (sē-rē-ā'li-a), n. pl. 1. The systematic name for that group of the Graminæ or grasses which comprises the edible grains. 2. In Rom. antiq. festivals in honour of Ceres, the goddess of corn.

Cerealious† (sē-rē-ā'li-us), a. Cereal. 'Any edulious or cerealious grains.' Sir T. Browne.

2. A usage of politeness, or such usages collectively; formality; a punctilious adherence to conventional forms of politeness; punctilio; punctiliousness.

> All ceremonies are in themselves very silly things; but yet a man of the world should know them. Ld. Chesterfield.
> When love begins to sicken and decay
> It useth an enforced ceremony.
> There are no tricks in plain and simple faith. Shak.
> His dress a suit of fray'd magnificence,
> Once fit for feasts of ceremony. Tennyson.

3.† In a concrete sense, a ceremonial symbol or decoration.

> No ceremony that to great ones 'longs,
> Not the king's crown, nor the deputed sword,
> The marshal's truncheon, nor the judge's robe,
> Become them with one half so good a grace
> As mercy does. Shak.
> Disrobe the images
> If you do find them decked with ceremonies. Shak.

—Master of ceremonies, an officer who superintends the reception of ambassadors; a person who regulates the forms to be observed by the company or attendants on a public occasion.

Cereopsis (sē-rē-op'sis), n. [L. cera, wax, whence the cere of a bird, and Gr. opsis, appearance: so named from the remarkable size of their cere.] A genus of birds, family Anatidæ. There is only one species, a native of Australia, and therefore known as the Australian or New Holland goose, about the size of a common goose.

Cereous (sē'rē-us), a. [L. cereus, from cera, wax.] Waxen; like wax. 'What is worth his observation goes into his cereous tables.' Gayton. [Rare.]

The name given to that portion of bees'-wax, amounting to 70 to 80 per cent of the whole, which is soluble in alcohol. According to Brodie this is merely impure cerotic acid.—3. An ore of cerium, a variety of the mineral allanite.

Cerinthian (sē-rin'thi-an), n. One of a sect of early heretics, so called from Cerinthus, one of the first heresiarchs in the church. The Gospel of John was supposed to have been written against his system, which was a mixture of Judaism and Gnosticism.

Ceriph (sēr'if), n. In type-founding, one of the fine lines of a letter, especially one of the fine cross lines at the top or bottom, as of I.

Cerise (se-rēz'), n. [Fr.; L. cerasus, a cherry.] Cherry-colour.

Cerise (se-rēz'), a. Of the colour of cerise; cherry-coloured.

Cerite (sē'rit), n. A rare mineral, a hydrated silicate of cerium, of a pale rose-red colour, with a tinge of yellow; very hard, and of a dull resinous lustre, occurring only in an abandoned copper-mine at Riddarhytta, in Sweden. It is the chief source of cerium, and is the mineral from which that metal was first obtained. It contains also lanthanium and didymium.

Cerithiidæ (sėr-i-thī'i-dē), n. pl. Club-shells, a family of plant-eating gasteropodous molluscs containing numerous species, both marine and fresh-water, as well as many inhabiting brackish water. The shells are spiral, elongated, and often whorled and varicose. About 100 recent species are known, and 460 fossil, which range from the trias upwards, some species being especially characteristic of tertiary strata. The typical genus is Cerithium. Also written Cerithiadæ.

Cerithium (sėr-ith'i-um), n. [Gr. keras, a horn, from their shape.] A genus of mollusca, the type of the family Cerithiidæ (which see).

Cerium (sē'ri-um), a. [From the planet Ceres.] Sym. Ce. At. wt. 92; sp. gr. 5·5. A metal discovered in 1803 by Klaproth, Hisinger, and Berzelius independently. It is a powder of lamellar texture, malleable, of a colour between that of iron and that of lead, and acquires the metallic lustre by pressure, which becomes bright by polishing, but soon tarnishes in the air. It exists in the mineral cerite, in which it was first found, as also in allanite, gadolinite, and some others.

'Cern† (sėrn). Contracted for concern. 'What 'cerns it you.' Shak.

Cernuous (sėr'nū-us), a. [L. cernuus.] Drooping; pendulous: applied by botanists to flowers which are placed on curved peduncles, and so have the top curved downward. Erroneously written also Cernous.

And, brethren, I myself am certain of you, that also ye ben full of love. Wickliffe.
Be certain what you do, sir, lest your justice Prove violence. Shak.

[This sense comes very near that of 1 (d). If a person says, I am certain of the support of some political party, it is not clear whether he means to give an assurance of his own feeling of confidence that that party will support him, or to announce that any one may count on his having that support; but when the statement is, Though he has doubts himself, I believe he is certain of the support of that party, it is clear that the speaker only intimates that such support can be relied on. The form of the expression is probably derived from the sense 2 (b), and its meaning has become modified by circumstances.] (c)† Having no doubt or hesitation regarding a course of conduct; resolved; determined: with an infinitive.

However I with thee have fixed my lot,
Certain to undergo like doom of death,
Consort with thee. Milton.

3. Stated; fixed; determinate; definite.

Cerumen (sē-rụ'men), n. [L. cera, wax.] The wax or yellow matter secreted by certain glands lying in the external canal of the ear. Its principal use seems to be to lubricate the passage, and also, according to some physiologists, to entangle particles of foreign matter and prevent them from reaching the membrana tympani.

Ceruminous (sē-rụ'mi-nus), a. Relating to or containing cerumen. — Ceruminous glands, the glands which secrete the wax of the ear.

Cerura (sē-rō'ra), n. [Gr. keras, a horn, and oura, the tail.] A genus of moths belonging to the family Bombycidæ, of which the best known is the C. vinula, or puss-moth, which feeds on the willow, poplar, &c. The caterpillars have a curious anal appendage, which is extensile: hence the name.

Ceruse (sē'rụs), n. [Fr., from L. cerussa, white-lead, from cera, wax.] White-lead, a mixture or compound of hydrate and carbonate of lead, produced by exposing the metal in thin plates to the vapour of vinegar. It is much used in painting, and a cosmetic is prepared from it. Lead is sometimes found native in the form of ceruse, but in this case it is an anhydrous metacarbonate ($PbCO_3$). — Ceruse of antimony is a white oxide of antimony, which separates from the water in which diaphoretic antimony has been washed.

Ceruse (sē'rụs), v.t. To wash with ceruse; to apply ceruse to as a cosmetic.

Here's a colour, what lady's cheek
Though cerus'd over comes near it? Beau. & Fl.

Cerusite, Cerussite (sē'rụ-sīt, sē-rụs'īt), n. A native carbonate of lead ($PbCO_3$), a common lead-ore, found in Cumberland, Cornwall, Leadhills, Siberia, Harz, &c., often in conjunction with galena or sulphide of lead. It occurs crystallized, fine, granular, or earthy. It is supposed to be derived from the decomposition of galena.

Cervelat (sėr've-lat), n. [From L. cervus, a stag, from resembling a horn.] An ancient musical wind-instrument, of a small size, producing, by means of a reed, tones resembling a bassoon. Also written Cervalet.

Cervical (sėr-vī'kal or sėr'vi-kal), a. [L. cervix, cervīcis, the neck.] Belonging to the neck; as, the cervical nerves; cervical vessels.

Various forms of Cestus.

cædo, cæsum, to strike.] Among the Greeks and Romans, a kind of boxing-glove or gauntlet, made of pieces of strong leather, loaded with lead or iron, which boxers fastened on their hands and arms by means of leather thongs. At first it was short, reaching no higher than the wrists, but it was afterwards enlarged up to the elbows.

Cestvaen (kest'va-en or kest'vān), n. See CISTVAEN.

Cesura, Cesure (sē-zū'ra, sē'zūr), n. See CÆSURA.

Cesural (sē-zū'ral), a. See CÆSURAL.

Cetacea (sē-tā'shē-a), n. pl. [L. cetus, Gr. kētos, any large sea-monster, a whale.] An order of marine mammiferous animals, surpassing in size all others in existence. They suckle their young, have warm blood, and respire by means of lungs, for which purpose they must frequently come to the surface of the water to take in fresh supplies of air. Their tail is not vertical, as in fishes, but horizontal. The Cetacea are commonly divided into five families: (a) the Balænidæ, or whalebone whales; (b) the Physeteridæ, or sperm whales; (c) the Delphinidæ, or dolphins; (d) the Rhynchoceti, or 'beaked' whales; and (e) the Zeuglodontidæ, all of which are fossil. The Sirenia are now made to form a distinct order of mammals.

Cetacean (sē-tā'shan), n. An animal of the order Cetacea.

Cetacean (sē-tā'shan), a. Same as Cetaceous.

Cetaceous (sē-tā'shus), a. Pertaining to the whale; belonging to the Cetacea or whale kind.

Cetate (sē'tāt), n. A salt of cetic acid.

Cetene (sē'tēn), n. ($C_{16}H_{32}$.) A colourless, oily, liquid hydrocarbon obtained from cetylic alcohol.

Ceteosaurus, n. See CETIOSAURUS.

Ceterach (set'ér-ak), n. [Fr. cétérac, It. cetracca, of Arabic or Persian origin.] A genus of ferns, sub-order Polypodiaceæ. The chief characters by which the genus is known are the reticulated veins, the simple sori, with scarcely any indusium, and the abundance of chaffy scales which clothe the under surface of the leaf. One species, C. officinarum (the scale-fern or miltwaste), is indigenous to Britain, and not uncommon on rocks and walls.

Cetic (sē'tik), a. [L. cetus, a whale.] Pertaining to the whale.—Cetic acid, an acid produced, according to Heintz, in very small quantity in the saponification of spermaceti. It crystallizes in nacreous scales, grouped in stars, melting at 53·5° C.

Cetin, Cetine (sē'tin), n. [L. cetus, a whale.] ($C_{32}H_{64}O_2$.) The name proposed by Chevreul for the crystallizable matter which forms the greater part of the substance called spermaceti.

Cetiosaurus, Ceteosaurus (sē'ti-ō-sạ"rus, sē'tē-ō-sạ"rus), n. [Gr. kētelos, of or belonging to a whale, and sauros, a lizard.] A genus of fossil saurians, the most gigantic of the order Deinosauria, whose vertebræ exhibit a slightly hollowed cup behind, the fore-part being flattened in the dorsal, but produced into a convex surface in the cervical part of the body. The articulations of the bones of the limbs, the possession of long claws, and the hollowness of the bones indicate that it was a terrestrial animal, probably an inhabitant of marshes or riversides. Their remains are found in the oolite and wealden formations.

Cetological (sē-tō-loj'i-kal), a. Pertaining to cetology.

Cetologist (sē-tol'o-jist), n. One who is versed in cetology or the natural history of the whale and its kindred animals.

Cetonia (sē-tō'ni-a), n. [Gr. ketonia.] A genus of coleopterous insects, the type of the family Cetoniadæ. C. aurata is the rose-chafer or rose-beetle.

Cetoniadæ (sē-tō-nī'a-dē), n. pl. A family of coleopterous insects, forming one of the most extensive groups of the beetle tribe. Nothing can exceed the brilliant colours with which many of them are adorned. The type genus is Cetonia.

Cetosaurian (sē-tō-sạ'ri-an), n. A member of the genus Cetiosaurus (which see).

Cetotolite (sē-tot'ō-līt), n. [Gr. kētos, a whale, ous, ōtos, an ear, and lithos, a stone.] A name provisionally given to certain fossil cetaceous teeth, and especially ear-bones, occurring in such profusion in the upper tertiary formation, as the red crag of Suffolk, that superphosphate of potash is prepared from them to the value of many thousand pounds annually and used as manure for land.

Cetraria (sē-trā'ri-a), n. [From L. cetra, little leather shield, targe, from the shape of the apothecia.] A genus of lichens related to Lecidea. They have a rigid, erect, and branching brown thallus, with lateral apothecia. Three species are found in Britain. The best known is C. islandica, or Iceland-moss. See ICELAND-MOSS.

Cetrarin, Cetrarine (sē'tra-rin), n. ($C_{18}H_{16}O_8$.) A vegetable principle extracted by alcohol from several lichens, as Cetraria islandica (Iceland-moss) and Sticta pulmonacea. It forms a fine white powder very bitter to the taste.

Cetus (sē'tus), n. [L.] In astron. the Whale, a large constellation of the southern hemisphere containing ninety-seven stars.

Cetyl (sē'til), n. [Gr. kētos, a whale, and hylē, matter.] ($C_{16}H_{33}$.) An alcoholic radical supposed to exist in a series of compounds obtained from spermaceti.

Cetylic (sē-til'ik), a. Pertaining to cetyl; as, cetylic alcohol.

Ceutorhynchus (sū-tō-ring'kus), n. [Gr. keuthō, to hide, to bury, and rhynchos, the snout.] A genus of coleopterous insects, family Curculionidæ, including several species, whose larvæ are very destructive to the turnip: C. assimilis is the turnip-seed weevil; C. contractus, the charlock weevil; and C. pleurostigma, the turnip-gall weevil.

Cevadilla, Cebadilla (sev-a-dil'la, seb-a-dil'la), n. The Spanish Mexican name for Asagræa officinalis. See ASAGRÆA.

Ceylanite (sē'lan-īt), n. [From Ceylon.] A ferruginous variety of spinel (Al_2MgO_4) from Ceylon.

Ceylonese (sē-lon-ēz'), a. Pertaining to Ceylon; Cingalese; Singhalese.

Ceylonese (sē-lon-ēz'), n. sing. and pl. A native or natives, an inhabitant or inhabitants of Ceylon; Cingalese or Singhalese.

Ceylon-moss (sē-lon'mos), n. The common name for Plocaria candida, an alga found in Ceylon and on the east coast of Bengal. It has been lately introduced as a substitute for farinaceous foods, having the same properties as carrageen or Irish-moss.

Cha (cha), n. [Hind.] A kind of tea, rolled up like tobacco, which goes to the interior of Asia.

Chabasie, Chabasite (kab'a-sē, kab'a-sīt), n. [Gr. chabazios, one of twenty species of stones mentioned in the poem Peri Lithōn ascribed to Orpheus.] A variety of zeolite which occurs in crystals whose primitive form is nearly a cube. Chabasite is a transparent mineral which may generally be represented by the formula $CaO.Al_2O_3.2SiO_2$.

Chablis (shab-lē), n. A celebrated white French wine, having good body and an exquisite perfume, so called from a town of that name near which it is produced.

Chabouk, Chabuk (cha-bụk'), n. [Hind. chabuk, a horse-whip.] A long whip; specifically, the whip used in the East for inflicting corporal punishment.

> Drag forward that Fakir, and cut his robe into tatters on his back with your chabouk.
> Sir W. Scott.

Akin cheap, cheapen, and chap in chapman. See CHEAP.] 1. To treat about a purchase; to bargain; to haggle; to negotiate; as, to chaffer with a fishwoman or a cabman. 'To chaffer for preferments with his gold.' Dryden.

The wives and daughters of the Kentish farmers came from the neighbouring villages with cream, cherries, wheatears, and quails. To chaffer with them, to flirt with them, to praise their straw hats and tight heels, was a refreshing pastime to voluptuaries sick of the airs of actresses and maids of honour. Macaulay.

2. To talk much and idly. Trench. [Trench (Select Glossary) seems to consider this the only meaning which the word now has; but such is certainly not the case.]

Chaffer† (chaf'ėr), v.t. 1. To buy or sell. Spenser.—2. To exchange. 'To chaffer words.' Spenser.

Chaffer† (chaf'ėr), n. Merchandise; bargaining. 'Small chaffer doth ease.' Skelton.

Chaffer (chaf'ėr), n. One who employs chaff or slangy banter. [Colloq.]

She was considered the best chaffer on the road, not one of them could stand against her tongue. Mayhew.

Chafferer (chaf'ėr-ėr), n. One who chaffers; a bargainer; a buyer.

Chaffern† (chaf'ėr-n), n. A vessel for heating water.

Chaffery† (chaf'ėr-i), n. [O.E. chaffare. See CHAFFER, v.i.] Traffic; buying and selling. 'Merchandise and chaffery.' Spenser.

Chaffinch (chaf'finsh), n. [Said to be so called from delighting in chaff, though it is rather the grain in which it delights. Perhaps named from its cry; comp. chiff-chaff, the name given to one of the British warblers from its cry.] A common British bird of the genus Fringilla, the F. cœlebs, whose pleasant short and oft-repeated song is heard from early spring to the middle of summer. The plumage of the male is very pretty. Chaffinches are useful in destroying aphides and caterpillars, though they injure various kinds of garden plants. In winter they feed mostly on seeds.

Chaffless (chaf'les), a. Without chaff from worthless matter, rubbish, or refuse.

The gods have made you,
Unlike all others, chaffless. Shak.

Chaffron (shaf'fron), n. See CHAMFRON.

Chaff-wax (chaf'waks). Same as Chafe-wax.

Chaff-weed (chaf'wēd), n. A popular name of Centunculus minimus, because of its small chaffy leaves. See CENTUNCULUS.

Chaffy (chaf'i), a. 1. Like chaff; full of chaff. 'Chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail.' Coleridge.—2. In bot. an epithet sometimes applied to the receptacle in compound flowers; paleaceous.—3. Fig. light; frivolous: said of persons and things. 'A chaffy lord not worth the name of villain.' Beau. & Fl. 'Slight and chaffy opinion.' Glanville.

Chafing-board (chāf'ing-bōrd), n. Naut. a batten fastened upon the rigging of a ship to prevent chafing.

Chafing-dish (chāf'ing-dish), n. A dish or vessel to hold coals for heating anything set on it; a portable grate for coals.

Chafing-gear (chāf'ing-gēr), n. Naut. mats or other soft substances placed on the rigging, spars, &c., to prevent chafing.

Chaft (chaft), n. [Dan. kiæft, Icel. kjaftr, a jaw. See CHAP.] One of the jaws. [Scotch.]

Chagreen (sha-grēn'), n. See SHAGREEN.

Chagrin (sha-grēn'), n. [Fr., said to be another form of shagreen, which, from being used to polish wood, has come to be employed as a type of grinding or gnawing care. See SHAGREEN.] Ill humour; vexation; peevishness; mortification; fretfulness; disquiet.

Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin. Pope.

Chagrin (sha-grēn'), v.t. [Fr. chagriner. See above.] To excite ill humour in; to vex; to mortify.

O! trifling head and fickle heart,
Chagrined at whatsoe'er thou art. T. Warton.

Chailletiaceæ (shāl-let'i-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. [After M. Caillet, a Swiss botanist.] A small order of tropical American, African, and Indian trees and shrubs, consisting of three genera, in one of which the flowers are polypetalous, while in the other two they are gamopetalous. The petals are small scale-like bodies, at the orifice of a tubular calyx. Chailletia toxicaria is known in Sierra Leone as rats'-bane, and is reputed very poisonous.

Chain (chān), n. [Fr. chaîne, O.Fr. chaene, cadene, Pr. cadena, from L. catena, a chain.] 1. A series of links or rings connected or fitted into one another, generally of some kind of metal, and used for various purposes, as a support, a fetter, a means of connection, or of the transmission of mechanical power, ornament, measurement, &c.—2. Fig. that which binds, restrains, confines, or fetters; a bond; a fetter; bondage; slavery: in this sense often in the plural; as, to be bound by the chains of evil habit.

The melting voice through mazes running,
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony. Milton.

3. In weaving, the warp threads of a web, so called because they form a long series of links or loops.—4. A series of things linked together; a series, line, or range of things connected or following in succession; as, a chain of causes, of ideas, or events; a chain of being; a chain of mountains.—5. pl. Naut. strong links or plates of iron bolted at the lower end to the ship's side, used to contain the blocks called dead-eyes, by which the shrouds of the mast are extended.—6. In surv. a measuring instrument, generally consisting of 100 links, each 7·92 inches in length, and consequently having a total length of 66 feet, or 4 poles.

Chain (chān), v.t. 1. To fasten, bind, restrain, or fetter with a chain or chains; as, to chain floating logs together; to chain a dog; to chain prisoners.—2. Fig. (a) to enslave; to keep in slavery.

And which more blest? Who chain'd his country, say,
Or he whose virtue sigh'd to lose a day? Pope.

(b) To restrain; to hold in control; to check.

He would stay swift diseases in old days,
Chain madmen by the music of his lyre. Matt. Arnold.

(c) To unite firmly; to link.

In this vow (I) do chain my soul to thine. Shak.

3. To block up or obstruct with a chain, as a harbour or passage.

Chain-belt (chān'belt), n. A chain forming a band or belt for conveying or transmitting power. It is sometimes covered with piping or overlaid with strips of various materials to form a round belt.

Chain-boat (chān'bōt), n. Naut. a large boat furnished with a davit and windlasses, used for getting up chains, anchors, &c.

Chain-bolt (chān'bōlt), n. Naut. one of the large bolts by which the chain-plates are fastened to the vessel's sides.

Chain-bond (chān'bond), n. In arch. a name sometimes given to bond-timber (which see). Called also Chain-timber.

Chain-bridge (chān'brij). See under BRIDGE.

Chain-cable (chān'kā-bl), n. A cable composed of iron links. See under CABLE.

Chain-coupling (chān'kup-ling), n. In rail. a supplementary coupling between carriages, &c., as a safety device in case the prime coupling should accidentally become uncoupled. E. H. Knight.

Chain-gang (chān'gang), n. A gang or number of convicts chained together.

I'd take my place with a chain-gang, and eat Norfolk Island biscuit. Lever.

Chain-guard (chān'gärd), n. In watch-making, a mechanism in watches, provided with a fusee, to prevent the watch being over-wound. E. H. Knight.

Chain-hook (chān'hōk), n. Naut. an iron rod with a handling-eye at one end and a hook at the other for hauling the chain-cables about.

Chainless (chān'les), a. Having no chains; incapable of being chained. 'The chainless mind.' Byron.

Chainlet (chān'let), n. [Dim. of chain.] A little chain.

The spurs and ringing chainlets sound. Sir W. Scott.

Chain-locker, Chain-well (chān'lok-ėr, chān'wel), n. Naut. the receptacle for the chain-cable below deck. The deck pipe, through which it passes, is made of iron. Steam vessels have frequently a movable box on deck for this purpose.

Chain-mail (chān'māl), n. See MAIL.

Chain-moulding (chān'mōld-ing), n. arch. a species of moulding cut in imitation of a chain. It is used in the Norman style.

Chain-pier (chān'pēr), n. A pier running into the sea, supported by chains like a suspension-bridge.

Chain-plate (chān'plāt), n. Naut. one of the iron plates used for securing the shrouds of the lower rigging to the sides. Called also Channel-plate.

Chain-pore Coral (chān'pōr ko'ral). Same as Catenipora.

Chain-pulley (chān'pul-i), n. A pulley having depressions in its periphery in which lie the links or alternate links of a chain which passes over it and gives motion thereto, or conversely. E. H. Knight.

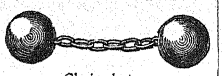
Chain-pump (chān'pump), n. A pump consisting, in one of its simplest and commonest forms, of an endless chain equipped with a sufficient number of valves or buckets a a a, moving on two wheels b b, one above, the other below, passing downward through a wooden tube and returning upwards through another c. The discs or valves on the chain fit as nearly as may be in the tube c, and by the continuous rotation of a crank a steady flow of water is kept up.

Chain-rule (chān'rōl), n. A rule of arithmetic, by which, when a succession or chain of equivalents is given, the last of each being of the same kind as the first of the next, a relation of equivalence is established between numbers of the first and last kind mentioned. Thus, if 112 lbs. avoirdupois make 104 lbs. of Holland, and 100 lbs. of Holland make 89 of Geneva, and 110 of Geneva make 117 of Seville, how many lbs. of Seville will make 100 lbs. avoirdupois?

Chain-shot (chān'shot), n. Two balls or half-balls connected by a chain, and serving when fired from ordnance to cut down masts or spars, or cut away shrouds and rigging.



Chain-shot.

Chain-stitch (chān'stich), n. In sewing, (a) work consisting of threads or cords linked together in the form of a chain, as lineal chaining or tambour work, reticulation or net-work, &c. (b) A kind of machine-sewing, which consists in looping the upper thread into itself on the under side of the fabric, or in using a second thread to engage the loop of the upper thread: in contradistinction to lock-stitch.

Chain-timber (chān'tim-bėr), n. In arch. (a) a large timber placed in the middle of the height of a story for imparting strength. (b) Same as Bond-timber.

Chain-wale (chān'wāl), n. Naut. channel (which see).

Chain-well. See CHAIN-LOCKER.

Chain-wheel (chān'whēl), n. An inversion of the chain-pump, by which it is converted into a recipient of water-power. It consists of a bucket-chain, which passes over a pulley and through a pipe of such a size that the buckets very nearly fill its section. The water flows into the pipe at the upper end, and descending, carries the buckets with it, thus setting the whole chain and therefore the pulley in motion. This wheel is also known as Lamolière's piston-wheel, the application having been first made by Lamolière.

Chain-work (chān'wėrk), n. Same as Chain-stitch.

Chair (chār), n. [O.E. chaire, chaiere, &c., from Fr. chaire, O.Fr. chayere, L. cathedra, Gr. kathedra, a seat—kata, down, and hezomai, to sit. Chaise is a corruption of chaire.] 1. A movable seat, with a back, for one person.—2. A seat of office or authority; as, the chair of a judge, a professor, the person who presides over a meeting or assembly, &c. Hence, the office itself, especially the office of a professor; as, to hold the chair of logic or divinity; to found a chair in a university; &c. Formerly used for a throne and a pulpit, and in senses derived by metonymy from these.

He makes for England, here to claim the crown.—
Is the chair empty? Shak.

His eloquence is masculine and exact, and has all the majesty of the chair in it. Bp. Burnet.

In certain phrases the word is used for the chairman of a meeting or assembly; as, to address or support the chair; but we do not use such phrases as the chair spoke. Chair! chair! is a frequent cry at public meetings when the authority of the chairman is not duly regarded.—3. A sedan-chair.

Think what an equipage thou hast in air,
And view with scorn two pages and a chair. Pope.

4.† A two-wheeled carriage, drawn by one horse; a chaise or gig.

E'en kings might quit their state to share
Contentment and a one-horse chair. T. Warton.

5. One of the iron blocks which support and secure the rails in a railway. A joint chair is one that secures the connection of two rails at their ends.—Chair of state, sometimes equivalent to a throne.—Groaning chair, the chair in which a woman sits when being confined, or after her confinement, to receive congratulations.

For the nurse, the child to dandle,
Sugar, soap, spiced pots, and candle,
A groaning chair, and eke a cradle.
Poor Robin's Almanack.

Chair (chār), v.t. To place or carry in a chair; to carry publicly in a chair in triumph.

The day the member was chaired several men in Coningsby's rooms were talking over their triumph. Disraeli.

Chair-bed (chār'bed), n. See BED-CHAIR.

Chair-days (chār'dāz), n. pl. The evening of life; the time of repose for old age.

In thy reverence and thy chair-days, thus
To die in ruffian battle. Shak.

Chairman (chār'man), n. 1. The presiding officer of an assembly, association, or company, committee, or public meeting.—2. One whose business is to carry a sedan-chair. Prior.

Chairmanship (chār'man-ship), n. The office of a chairman or presiding officer of a meeting.

Chair-organ (chār'or-gan), n. A name given to the prestant or choir-organ from a notion that it formed the seat of the performer when placed behind him.

Chaise (shāz), n. [A French corruption of chaire. In the sixteenth century the Parisians in many words substituted the sound of z for that of r, and in this case, as a distinct meaning was attached to each form, the modification was adopted as a new word.] A two-wheeled carriage drawn by one or more horses, and generally furnished with a hood or top that may be let down.

Chaise (shāz), n. A gold coin current in France from 1346 to 1430, varying in value at different periods. It was named from the chair [Fr. chaise] in which the figure was represented as sitting. Chaises were also coined in England in the reign of Edward III.

Chaise-lounge (shāz'lounj), n. [Fr. chaise, a chair, and E. lounge.] A sort of sofa, open at one end; a couch.

Chaitya (chāt'ya), n. See Buddhist architecture under BUDDHIST.

Chalaza (ka-lā'za), n. [Gr. chalaza, hail, a hailstone, a pimple.] 1. In bot. that part of the ovule or seed where the integuments cohere with each other and with the nucleus.—2. In zool. one of the two membranous twisted cords which bind the yolk-bag of an egg to the lining membrane at the two ends of the shell and keep it near the middle as it floats in the albumen, so that the cicatricula or germinating point is always uppermost, and consequently nearest the source of heat during the process of incubation.

Chalazal (ka-lā'zal), a. Of or relating to a chalaza; as, the chalazal end of an ovule.

Chalaze (ka-lāz'), n. A rarer form of Chalaza (which see).

Chalcedonic (kal-sē-don'ik), a. Pertaining to chalcedony.

Chalcedony (kal-sed'ō-ni), n. [From Chalcedon, an ancient Greek town in Asia Minor, opposite to Byzantium or Constantinople.] A sub-species of quartz, a mineral called also white agate, resembling milk diluted with water, and more or less clouded or opaque, with veins, circles, and spots. It is used in jewelry. There are several varieties, as common chalcedony, chrysoprase, sard, and sardonyx.

Chalcedonyx (kal-sed'ō-niks), n. [From chalcedony and onyx.] A variety of agate, in which white and gray layers alternate. Buchanan.

Chalcographer, Chalcographist (kal-kog'raf-ėr, kal-kog'raf-ist), n. [See CHALCOGRAPHY.] An engraver on brass or copper.

Chalcographic, Chalcographical (kal-ko-graf'ik, kal-ko-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to chalcography.

We shall now give the names of chalcographic artists according to the date of their proficiency. Ency. Brit.

Chalcography (kal-kog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. chalkos, copper, brass, and graphō, to engrave.] The art of engraving on copper or brass.

Chaldaic (kal-dā'ik), a. Pertaining to Chaldea or Chaldæa, anciently a country on the Euphrates in Asia. Of this Babylon was the principal city.

Chaldese† (kal-dēz'), v.t. To trick; to injure by trickery. See CALDESE.

Chaldron (chäl'dron), n. [Fr. chaudron, a kettle. The same word as caldron.] A measure of coals consisting of 36 bushels, or 25½ cwt.; the Newcastle chaldron is 52½ or 53 cwt. In American ports the weight is very various, but the ordinary weight in the United States is 26½ cwt.

Chalet (shä-lā), n. [Fr.; properly a Swiss word.] One of the huts or cabins in which cattle and herdsmen are housed for the night on the Swiss mountains, and where the cheese is manufactured. The name is sometimes extended to any dwelling-house of the Swiss peasantry having local characteristics in its style of building.

Chalets are summer huts for the Swiss herdsmen. Wordsworth.

Chalice (chal'is), n. [O.Fr. chalice, a cup, a chalice, from L. calix, calicis, a cup or goblet.] 1. † A drinking cup or bowl.

This even-handed justice
Commends the ingredients of our poison'd chalice
To our own lips. Shak.

2. A communion cup used to administer the wine in the celebration of the holy eucharist. Chalices are generally made of silver, but many are of gold or gilt and jewelled, and of beautiful artistic design and elaborate workmanship.

Chalice, from Treasury in Mayence Cathedral.

Chaliced† (chal'ist), a. Having a cup, as a flower. 'Chaliced flowers.' Shak.

Chalicotherium (kal'i-kō-thē''ri-um), n. [Gr. chalix, gravel, rubble, and thērion, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil pachydermatous animals, allied to the tapirs, comprising two species. They are found in strata of the miocene.

Chalk (chąk), n. [A. Sax. ceale, from L. calx, lime, limestone; whence also D. Dan. Sw. and G. kalk, Fr. chaux.] A well-known earthy limestone, of an opaque white colour, soft, and admitting no polish. It is an impure carbonate of lime, and is used as an absorbent and antacid.—Black chalk is a species of earth used by painters for drawing on coloured paper.—Brown chalk, a familiar name for umber.—Red chalk, a natural clay containing from 15 to 20 per cent. of the protoxide and carbonate of iron.—French chalk, steatite or soap-stone, a soft magnesian mineral.—Drawing chalks were originally restricted in colours to white, black, and red, but now chalks of every colour are used, and are known by the name of crayons.—In geol. chalk is the rock which forms the higher part of a series or group of strata, comprising rocks of different kinds, termed the cretaceous system, constituting the upper strata of the secondary age, immediately preceding the tertiary. The chalk formation extends over the south-eastern and eastern counties of England, north of France, Germany, and north of Europe. It is stratified, and varies from a thousand to a few feet in depth. It is characterized by peculiar fossils, the most distinctive being gigantic lizards, as the iguanodon, megalosaurus, plesiosaurus, pterodactyl, &c., and by containing numerous nodules of flint. True or white chalk is a rock formed of the shells and debris of the shells of foraminiferous animalcules, and hence is a rock of organic origin.—Chalk style, in engr. See STIPPLING.—Chalk for cheese, an inferior article for a good one; one thing for another.

Lo! how they feignen chalke for cheese. Gower.

—A long chalk, a long way; thus, to beat one by a long chalk or long chalks is to beat him by a long way, or to excel him in a high degree: in allusion to the ancient custom of making the merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common. Brewer. [Colloq.]

Chalk (chąk), v.t. 1. To rub with chalk; to mark with chalk.—2. To manure with chalk, as land.—3. To make white, as with chalk; to bleach; to make pale.

Fear
Stared in her eyes, and chalk'd her face and wing'd
Her transit to the throne. Tennyson.

4. To mark; to trace out; to describe: from the use of chalk in marking lines.

It is you that have chalk'd forth the way
Which brought us hither. Shak.

I shall pursue the plan I have chalked out. Burke.

—To chalk up, to charge; to put down to one's account: in allusion to the old custom, prevalent especially among publicans and milk-sellers, of keeping a tally on which what was not paid was chalked down.—To chalk out, in Scotland, an old mode of warning burgh tenants to quit, by marking doors with chalk, which is still competent.

Chalk-cutter (chąk'kut-ėr), n. A man that digs chalk.

Chalk-drawing (chąk'drą-ing), n. A drawing sketched and filled in with black or coloured chalks.

Chalk-hill (chąk'hil), n. A hill of chalk. Tennyson.

Chalkiness (chąlk'i-nes), n. The state of being chalky.

Chalk-mark (chąk'märk), n. A mark made by chalk. 'No chalk-mark now visible.' Carlyle.

Chalk-pit (chąk'pit), n. A pit in which chalk is dug.

Chalk-quarry (chąk'kwo-ri), n. A quarry from which chalk is got. Tennyson.

Chalk-stone (chąk'stōn), n. 1. In med. a calcareous concretion in the hands and feet of persons violently affected by the gout.—2. A small lump of chalk. Is. xxvii. 9.

Chalky (chąk'i), a. 1. Resembling chalk; as, a chalky taste.—2. Consisting of or containing chalk. 'Thy chalky cliffs.' Shak.

Challenge (chal'lenj), n. [O.E. chalenge, calenge, &c., from O.Fr. chalenge, calenge, calonge, &c., claim, accusation, dispute, from L. calumnia, a false accusation, a calumny, in L.L. an action at law in which a person attempts to establish his claim to anything. Calumny is thus the same word in a less modified form.] 1. An invitation to a contest or trial of any kind; as, a challenge to a rubber at whist; a challenge to a public debate. 'A challenge to controversy.' Goldsmith. Specifically—2. A calling upon one to fight in a single combat; an invitation or summons, verbal or written, to decide a controversy by a duel. Hence—3. The letter or message containing the summons to a contest.—4.† A claim or demand made of a right or supposed right.

> Either accept the title thou usurp'st,
> Of benefit proceeding from our king
> And not of any challenge of desert. Shak.

5. Milit. the act of a sentry in demanding the countersign from any one who appears at or near his post.—6. In hunting, the opening and crying of hounds at first finding the scent of their game.—7. A calling in question; an exception taken, as to a person's right to do something; specifically, in law, an exception to jurors; the claim of a party that certain jurors shall not sit in trial upon him or his cause. The right of challenge is given both in civil and criminal trials, for certain causes which are supposed to disqualify a juror to be an impartial judge. In England the challenge may extend either to the whole array, called a challenge to the array, or only to particular jurors, called a challenge to the polls. Both of these challenges are subdivided into principal challenges and challenges to the favour. A principal challenge is when an objection of obvious weight is alleged, as that one or more of the jury are returned at the nomination of the plaintiff or defendant. A challenge to the favour is when the party alleges a cause that might probably bias the sheriff, or other returning officer, as that the defendant is tenant to the sheriff. In criminal cases challenges may be made either on the part of the crown or on that of the prisoner, and either to the whole array or to the separate polls. In capital cases the prisoner is allowed an arbitrary species of challenge, known as a peremptory challenge, without showing any cause at all, limited in cases of treason to thirty-five jurors, and in felonies to twenty.

Challenge (chal'lenj), v.t. pret. and pp. challenged; ppr. challenging. 1. To call to a contest; to invite to a trial; to defy; as, to challenge a man to prove what he asserts, implying defiance.

> Thus formed for speed, he challenges the wind,
> And leaves the Scythian arrow far behind. Dryden.

2. To call, invite, or summon to answer for an offence by single combat or duel.

> By this I challenge him to single fight. Shak.

3.† To accuse; to call to answer; to censure. 'Dishonoured thus and challenged of wrongs.' Shak.

> Who may I rather challenge for unkindness,
> Than pity for mischance. Shak.

4. To claim as due; to demand as a right; as, the Supreme Being challenges our reverence and homage. 'Challenge better terms.' Addison.—5. In law, to demand the removal of from among the jurymen. See the noun, 7.—6. In general, to object to (a person or thing); to take exception to; to call in question; as, to challenge the accuracy of a quotation.

Challenge (chal'lenj), v.i. In hunting, to make a whimper or whine when the scent of game is first discovered: said of a hound.

Challengeable (chal'lenj-a-bl), a. Capable of being challenged; capable of being called to an account. 'How lords are challengeable by their vassals.' J. Sadler.

Challenger (chal'lenj-ėr), n. One who challenges; as, (a) one who defies another to a contest of any kind. (b) An objector; one who calls in question.

> His hour is come,
> The impious challenger of pow'r divine. Cowper.

Challis (shal'li), n. An elegant silk and woollen fabric, very pliable, and without gloss, frequently finished with printed or woven designs and figures, and used for ladies' dresses.

Chalon, Chaloun,† n. [O.Fr.] A coverlet; a blanket. Chaucer.

Chalybean (ka-lib'ē-an), a. Pertaining to the Chalybes, an ancient people of Asia famed as workers in iron and steel; hence, as applied to steel, well-tempered. 'Chalybean tempered steel.' Milton.

Chalybeate (ka-lib'ē-āt), a. [Gr. chalyps, chalybos, steel.] Impregnated with iron: applied to a medicine containing iron, and especially to springs and waters impregnated with iron, or holding iron in solution, such as the water of Tunbridge, Spa, Cheltenham, Scarborough, Bridge of Allan, and many others. The iron generally exists as carbonate, and is held in solution by the carbonic acid contained in the water: on exposure to the air the carbonic acid escapes and the iron is partly precipitated.

Chalybeate (ka-lib'ē-āt), n. Any water or other liquid into which iron enters.

Chalybite (kal'i-bīt), n. [See CHALYBEATE.] A native anhydrous metacarbonate of iron ($FeCO_3$), existing abundantly under the name of Spathic or Sparry Ore, or Siderite, in gneiss, mica-slate, clay-slate, in connection with the carboniferous system, and occasionally in trap rocks. It is often met with in conjunction with other metals. It occurs in rhomboidal crystals, also in botryoidal and globular forms, and occasionally in silky fibrous masses. Sp. gr. 3·7 to 3·9. A siliceous or argillaceous variety called clay ironstone, occurring in the coal-measures, is one of the most abundant and valuable ores of iron. Combined with carbonaceous matter it forms the blackband ironstone. Very large quantities of both ores are found and worked in South Staffordshire, at Merthyr Tydvil in South Wales, and near Glasgow.

Cham† (cham), v.t. [See CHAMP.] To champ; to chew. Sir T. More.

Cham (kam), n. The sovereign prince of Tartary. Now usually written Khan. 'Fetch you a hair off the great cham's beard.' Shak.

Chama (kā'ma), n. [Gr. chaō, to gape.] The gaping cockle, a genus of large marine bivalve shells, belonging to the family Chamaceæ. The valves of the shell are unequal, elate, and convex, with subspiral beaks. C. gigas, or giant chama, is the largest and heaviest shell yet discovered, some specimens measuring 3 or 4 feet across. It is found in the Indian Ocean.

Chamade (sha-mād' or sha-mād'), n. [Fr., from It. chiamata, a calling, chiamare, to call, from L. clamare, to call=E. claim.] Milit. the beat of a drum or sound of a trumpet inviting an enemy to a parley, as for making a proposition for a truce or for a capitulation.

> They beat the chamade and sent us carte blanche.
> Addison.

Chamæleo (ka-mē'lē-o), n. A genus of saurian reptiles, containing the chameleons, co-extensive with the family Chamæleontidæ. See CHAMELEON.

Chamærops (kam-ē'rops), n. [Gr. chamai, on the ground, and rhōps, a twig.] A genus of palms consisting of dwarf trees with fan-shaped leaves borne on prickly petioles, and a small berry-like fruit with one seed. They are natives of the northern hemisphere. C. humilis is the only native European palm. It does not extend further north than Nice. The leaves are employed in making hats, baskets, &c. A Chinese species, C. Fortunei, is quite hardy in the south of England.

Chamæsaura (kam-ē-są'ra), n. [Gr. chamai, on the ground, and sauros, a lizard.] A genus of South African snake-like lizards, consisting only of one species, the Chamæsaura anguina, or snake-lizard. In general appearance it is scarcely to be distinguished from a snake, its four limbs being rudimentary, and the separation between the tail and body so slightly defined as to be almost invisible.

Chamayle,† n. A camel. Chaucer.

Chamber (chām'bėr), n. [Fr. chambre, L. camera, Gr. kamara, a vault or arched roof, from same root as in Celt. cam, crooked.] 1. A room of a dwelling-house; an apartment: in this sense now generally used only in the more elevated style.

> The chamber where the good man meets his fate
> Is privileged beyond the common walk
> Of virtuous life, quite in the verge of heaven.
> Young.

2. pl. (a) A room or rooms where professional men, as lawyers, conduct their business; especially, the room in which judges of the superior courts sit for the disposing of points of practice and other matters not sufficiently important to be heard and argued in court; judges' chambers. (b) Furnished rooms hired for residence in the house of another; lodgings. 'A bachelor life in chambers.' Thackeray.—3. A place where an assembly meets; as, the star-chamber; ecclesiastical chamber; privy chamber, &c.—4. By metonymy, the assembly itself; as, a vote of the imperial chamber; the chamber of commerce.—5. A compartment or inclosed space; a hollow or cavity; as, the chamber of the eye; the chamber of a furnace, &c.

> And all the secret of the Spring
> Moved in the chambers of the blood. Tennyson.

Specifically, (a) in hydraulic engineering, (1) the space between the gates of a canal-lock. (2) The part of a pump in which the bucket or plunger works. (b) Milit. (1) that part of the chase of a firearm where the powder lies. (2) An underground cavity for holding powder and bombs, where they may be safe and secured from rain. Called also Powder-chamber, Bomb-chamber. (3) A cavity in a mine, generally of a cubical form, where the powder is confined.—6.† A short piece of ordnance without a carriage but standing on its breach: formerly used chiefly for rejoicings and theatrical purposes.

> A gallant peal of chambers gave a period to the entertainment. Howell.

—Chamber of agriculture, an association of agriculturists for the purpose of promoting and protecting the interests of agriculture. —Chamber of commerce, a board to protect the interests of commerce, chosen from among the merchants and traders of a city. —Chambers of the eye, the space between the cornea and anterior surface of the iris, called the anterior chamber, and the space between the posterior surface of the iris and the crystalline lens, called the posterior chamber; both spaces being filled with the aqueous humour.—Judges' chambers. See above 2 (a).—To sit at chambers, to despatch summary business in chambers: said of a judge.

Chamber (chām'bėr), v.i. 1. To reside in or occupy as a chamber.—2. To be wanton; to indulge in lewdness or licentiousness.

> Let us walk honestly, . . . not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness.
> Rom. xiii. 13.

Chamber (chām'bėr), v.t. To shut up in, or as in, a chamber. 'The best blood chambered in his bosom.' Shak.

Chamber-council (chām'bėr-koun-sil), n. Private or secret council. Shak.

Chamber-counsel, Chamber-counsellor (chām'bėr-koun-sel, chām'bėr-koun-sel-ėr), n. A counsel or person learned in the law who gives his opinion in private, but does not advocate causes in court.

Chambered (chām'bėrd), p. and a. Divided into compartments by walls or partitions; as, a chambered shell.

Chamberer (chām'bėr-ėr), n. 1. One who intrigues or indulges in wantonness; a gallant.

> Haply for I am black,
> And have not those soft parts of conversation
> That chamberers have. Shak.

2.† One who attends in a chamber; a groom of a chamber; a chamberlain.—3.† A chamber-maid.

> I ne held me never digne in no manere
> To be your wif, ne yet your chamberere. Chaucer.

Chamber-fellow (chām'bėr-fel-lō), n. One who sleeps in the same apartment.

Chamber-hanging (chām'bėr-hang-ing), n. Tapestry or hangings for a chamber.

Chamberlain (chām'bėr-lān or chām'bėr-lin), n. [O.Fr. chamberlain, chambrelain, chambrelene (It. camarlingo, Sp. camarlengo), from O.H.G. chamarling, chamarlinc, Mod. G. kämmerling—kammer, chamar, chamber (see CHAMBER), and suffix -ling.] 1. A person charged with the direction and management of a chamber or chambers. Specifically—(a) † An attendant, sometimes a male, sometimes a female, at an inn, equivalent to a present head waiter or upper chamber-maid, or who discharged duties analogous to those of both.

I had as lieve the chamberlaine of the White Horse had called me up to bed. Peele.

(b) An officer charged with certain high duties in connection with the household of a monarch or other great personage; an official who has certain ceremonial functions in connection with a corporation or a grandee. The lord chamberlain of Great Britain is the sixth officer of the royal household, and his office is quite distinct from that of the lord great-chamberlain and is changed with the administration. This officer has control of most departments of the household which are not under the direction of the lord-steward, the groom of the stole, or the master of the horse. The royal chaplains, physicians, surgeons, &c., as well as the royal tradesmen, are by his appointment; the companies of actors at the royal theatres are under his regulation; and he is also the licenser of plays. Persons wishing to be presented at court must be such as he approves of, and the invitations to royal balls, parties, and receptions are sent out by him. He has also the duty of providing the state robes of the royal family, officers of state, &c. The lord great-chamberlain has the government of the palace of Westminster, superintends the fitting up of Westminster Hall for coronations, banquets, trials, attends the sovereign when visiting parliament, &c. The office is now jointly held by the families of Cholmondeley and Willoughby de Eresby, and the honours are enjoyed in each alternate reign by each family successively.—2. A receiver of rents and revenues, as, the chamberlain of a corporation.

Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth thee. Rom. xvi. 23.

Chamberlainship (chām'bėr-lān-ship or chām'bėr-lin-ship), n. The office of a chamberlain.

Chamber-lie, n. See CHAMBER-LYE.

Chamberlin† (chām'bėr-lin), n. A chamber attendant. See CHAMBERLAIN, 1.

In the kind office of a chamberlin,
Showed him his room where he must lodge that night,
Pull'd off his boots, and took away the light.
Milton.

Chamber-lye,† Chamber-lie† (chām'bėr-lī), n. [See LYE.] Urine collected in a chamber utensil; stale urine. Shak.

Chamber-maid (chām'bėr-mād), n. A woman who has the care of chambers, making the beds and cleaning the rooms, or who dresses a lady and waits upon her in her apartment.

Chamber-master (chām'bėr-mas-tėr), n. A shoemaker who makes up his own material at home, and disposes of it to the shops. Mayhew.

Chamber-music (chām'bėr-mū-zik), n. Vocal or instrumental compositions suitable for performance in a chamber, as opposed to a concert-hall.

Chamber-organ (chām'bėr-or-gan), n. A small organ suitable for a private room or chamber, in contradistinction to the larger organs used in churches, concert-rooms, &c.

Chamber-pot (chām'bėr-pot), n. A vessel for containing slops, used in bed-rooms.

Chamber-practice (chām'bėr-prak-tis), n. The practice of a chamber-counsel, who gives his opinions in private or at his chambers, but who does not advocate cases in court.

Chamber-story (chām'bėr-stō-ri), n. That story of a house which is appropriated for bed-rooms. Gwilt.

Chambertin (shäṅ-ber-taṅ), n. A superior sort of red Burgundy wine, named after the place where the grapes from which it is made grow. 'The chambertin with yellow seal.' Thackeray.

We will try a bottle of the chambertin to-day, Vincent. Lord Lytton.

Chamblet,† n. Camlet. Beau. & Fl.

Chamblet,† v.t. To streak, as marble; to variegate.

Some have their veins more varied and chambleted as oak, whereof wainscot is made. Bacon.

Chambranle (sham-branl'), n. [Fr.] In arch. an ornament of stone or wood bordering the three sides of doors, windows, and chimneys. The top part is called the traverse, and the two sides the ascendants.

Chambray (sham'brā), n. [From a place of the same name in France.] A kind of gingham or plain-coloured dress-stuff, with linen finish.

Chambrel (kam'brel), n. [A form of gambrel.] The joint or bending of the upper part of a horse's hind-leg.

Chameck (sha-mek'), n. A Brazilian monkey, genus Ateles, and family Cebidæ. The head is round and small, limbs long and slender, the thumb of the fore-hands wanting. It is a very gentle creature, and susceptible of a high degree of training. The length of the body is 20 inches, its tail is over 2 feet.

Chameleon (ka-mē'lē-on), n. [Gr. chamaileōn—chamai, on the ground, and leōn, lion; lit. ground-lion.] 1. A lizard of the genus Chamæleo, having a naked body, a prehensile tail, four feet suited for grasping branches, and the eye covered by a single circular eyelid with an aperture in the centre. There are several species, of which the best known is C. africanus or C. vulgaris, a native of Africa, Asia, and the south of Europe. Its body is 6 or 7 inches long, and the tail 5 inches; with this it clings to the branches of trees. The skin is cold to the touch, and contains small grains or eminences of a bluish-gray colour in the shade, but in the light of the sun all parts of the body become of a grayish-brown or tawny colour. The extraordinary faculty which the chameleon possesses of changing its colour, either in accordance with that of the objects by which it is surrounded or with its temper when disturbed, is due to the presence of clear or pigment-bearing contractile cells placed at various depths in the skin, their contractions and dilatations being under the influence of the nervous system. Their power of fasting and habit of inflating themselves gave rise to the fable that these animals lived on air. They are in reality insectivorous, their tongue, which is long and covered with a viscid saliva, being darted at their prey and thus securing it when touched.

The thin chameleon, fed with air, receives
The colour of the thing to which he cleaves.
Dryden.

2. The name given by Bayer to a constellation near the south pole, invisible in our latitudes. There are ten stars marked in it. —Chameleon mineral, a name formerly given to a mass produced by fusing oxide of magnesia with nitre or potash. When dissolved in water it assumes a variety of colours, passing rapidly from green to blue, purple, and red.

Chameleonize (ka-mē'lē-on-īz), v.t. To change into various colours. Bailey. [Rare.]

Chamelot† (kam'e-lot), n. Camlet. Spenser.

Chamfer, Chamfret (cham'fėr, cham'fret), n. [Fr. chanfrein, a chamfer.] 1. In carp. a small gutter or furrow cut in wood or other hard material.—2. A bevel or slope; the corner of anything originally right-angled cut aslope equally on the two sides which form it.

Chamfer (cham'fėr), v.t. 1. In carp. to cut a furrow in; to flute; to channel.—2. To cut or grind in a sloping manner, as the edge of anything square, so as to form a bevel.

Chamfret. See CHAMFER, n.

Chamfron (cham'fron), n. [O.Fr. chamfrein, Mod. Fr. chenfrein, probably for champfrein, from champ, field, battle-field, and frein, L. frenum, a bridle.] The defensive armour for the fore-part of the head of a war-horse.

Chamlet, n. Same as Camlet.

Chamois (sham'oi or sham'wą), n. [Fr. chamois (a Swiss word), from O.G. gamz, Mod. G. gemse, the chamois.] 1. A species of goat-like or capriform antelope (Antilope rupicapra or Rupicapra tragus), inhabiting high inaccessible mountains in Europe and West of Asia. Its size is about that of a well-grown goat, and it is so agile that it can clear at a bound crevices of 16 or 18 feet wide. The chamois is one of the most wary of antelopes, and possesses the power of scenting man at an almost incredible distance, so that the hunting of it is an occupation of extreme difficulty and much danger. Its skin is made into a soft leather called chamois or shammy.—2. A kind of soft leather made from various skins dressed with fish-oil: so called because first prepared from the skin of the chamois. Sometimes used adjectively in conjunction with leather; as, chamois-leather.

Chamois-leather (sham'wą or sha-moi' leTH-ėr), n. See CHAMOIS, 2.

Chamomile (kam'ō-mīl), n. [L.L. camomilla, L. chamæmelon, Gr. chamaimēlon—chamai, on the ground, and mēlon, an apple, from the apple-like smell of its flower.] Anthemis nobilis, a bitter plant much used in medicine, especially the flowers. It was formerly imagined that the chamomile grew the more luxuriantly the more frequently trodden on; and this was a favourite subject of allusion in ancient writers.

Chamomile (Anthemis nobilis).

For though the chamomile the more it is trodden on, the faster it grows; yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears. Shak.

—Wild chamomile is the British plant Matricaria Chamomilla.

Champ, Champe (champ), n. [Fr. champ, a field, from L. campus, a field.] In arch. the field or ground on which carving is raised. Oxford Glossary.

Champ (champ), v.t. [Perhaps from O.Fr. champayer, to graze, from champ, L. campus, a field, but more probably a modification of obsolete cham, to chew, and connected with Sw. dial. kämsa, to chew.] 1. To bite with repeated action of the teeth; as, a horse champs the bit.

But, like a proud steed reined, went haughty on,
Champing his iron curb. Milton.

2. To bite into small pieces; to chew; to munch; to craunch: sometimes followed by up.

I champed up the remaining part of the pipe. Steele.

And champing golden grain, the horses stood Hard by their chariots. Tennyson.

3. [Scotch.] To pound; to crush; to mash; as, to champ potatoes.

Champ (champ), v.i. To chew; to perform the action of biting by repeated motion of the teeth; as, to champ upon the bit.

Champ (champ), n. The name given to a valuable kind of timber produced in the East Indies by Magnolia excelsa.

Champac, Champak (cham'pak), n. [Skr. and Beng. champaka.] A beautiful Indian tree (Michelia Champaca, nat. order Magnoliaceæ), held in high esteem by Brahmanists and Buddhists. Images of Buddha are made of its wood, which is also used in construction, for furniture, &c. Its flowers are worn in the hair by Eastern ladies, being of a beautiful golden colour and very fragrant. This perfume is much celebrated in Hindu poetry.

The wandering airs they faint,
On the dark, the silent stream—
The champak odours fail,
Like sweet thoughts in a dream. Shelley.

Champagne (sham-pān'), n. A kind of wine made chiefly in the department of Marne, in the former province of Champagne, in France. Champagne is commonly divided into river and mountain wines, the former being for the most part white, the latter red. The still or the creaming or slightly sparkling wines are more highly valued by connoisseurs than the full-frothing wines, in which the small portion of alcohol they contain escapes from the froth as it rises to the surface, carrying with it the aroma, and leaving the liquor that remains in the glass nearly vapid.

Champaign, Champain (sham-pān'), n. [O.Fr. champaigne, from champ, L. campus, a field. See CAMPAIGN.] A flat open country. 'Their fellow-huntsman o'er the wide champaign.' Keats. 'Many a vale and river-sundered champaign clothed with corn.' Tennyson.

Champaign (sham-pān'), a. Level; open. 'A wide, champaign country filled with herds and flocks.' Addison.

Champan (sham'pan), n. See SAMPAN.

Champarty (cham'pėr-ti), n. 1. Champerty. 2.† A share of land; a partnership in power. Chaucer.

Champer (champ'ėr), n. One that champs or bites.

Champert† (cham'pėrt), n. Same as Champerty.

Champertor (cham'pėr-tėr), n. In law, one who is guilty of champerty (which see).

Champerty (cham'pėr-ti), n. [Fr. champ, a field, and parti, divided, from L. campus, a field, and pars, partis, a part.] In law, a species of maintenance, being a bargain which a party not otherwise interested makes with a plaintiff or defendant to receive a share of the land or other matter in suit if the person with whom the bargain is made is successful, the champertor carrying on or assisting to carry on the party's suit at his own expense; the purchase of a suit or of the right of suing. Champerty is a punishable offence both by common law and statute. Written also Champarty.

Champignon (sham-pin'yon; Fr. pron. shoṅ-pēn-yoṅ), n. [From L.L. campinio, what grows in fields, from L. campus, a field.] The French name for mushrooms in general, but applied in this country only to the two edible species Agaricus campestris, the common mushroom, and A. oreades, a species growing in fairy rings.

> He viler friends with doubtful mushrooms treats,
> Secure for you, himself champignons eats.
> Dryden.

Champion (cham'pi-on), n. [Fr. champion, Pr. campion, It. campione, L.L. campio, campionis, a champion, from L. campus, a field, in the later sense of combat, duel. The A. Sax. camp, a fight; cempa, a warrior; Sc. kemp, to strive; D. kamp, Dan. kamp, G. kampf, a fight; Icel. kapp, Dan. kap, a contest, appear also to come from L. campus.] 1. One who comes forward in defence of any cause; especially one who engages in single combat in the cause of another. 'Zealous champions for truth.' Locke.

> Demand of yonder champion
> The cause of his arrival here in arms. Shak.

In our common law, champion is taken no less for him that trieth the combat in his own case, than for him that fighteth in the case of another. Cowell.

2. More generally, a hero; a brave warrior. 'Renowned for hardy and undoubted champions.' Shak. — 3. One who has acknowledged superiority in certain matters decided by public contest or competition, as prize-fighting, pedestrianism, rowing, ploughing, &c.; one open to contend with all comers, or otherwise requiring to resign the title. — Champion of the king, a person whose office it was at the coronation of our kings to ride armed into Westminster Hall while the king was at dinner there, and by the proclamation of a herald to make challenge to this effect, 'that if any man should deny the king's title to the crown he was ready to defend it in single combat.' This ceremony is now discontinued.

Champion (cham'pi-on), a. An epithet applied to a person who has defeated all rivals at open competitions; as, the champion sculler of England; the champion ploughman of Scotland.

Champion (cham'pi-on), v.t. 1.† To challenge to a combat.

> Come fate into the list,
> And champion me to the utterance. Shak.

2. To maintain or support a cause or an individual; to act as champion for.

> Championed or unchampioned, thou diest by the stake or faggot. Sir W. Scott.

Championess (cham'pi-on-es), n. A female champion. Dryden. [Rare.]

Championship (cham'pi-on-ship), n. State of being a champion.

Chance (chans), n. [O.E. chaunce, from O.Fr. chaance, cheance, Mod.Fr. chance, chance, hazard, risk, luck, from L.L. cadentia, a falling (E. cadence), from L. cadere, to fall; in allusion to the falling of the dice.] 1.† Cast, throw, or number turned up in playing at dice.

> Seven is my chaunce, and thyn is cink and treye.
> Chaucer.

2. A casual or fortuitous event; an accident.

> The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; . . . but time and chance happeneth to them all. Eccles. ix. 11.
> What chance is this? how is it I see you here?
> Tennyson.

3. [No pl.] That which is regarded as determining the course of events in the absence of law, ordinary causation, or providence; absence of assignable cause; accident; as, to meet a person by chance.

> And by chance there came down a certain priest that way. Luke x. 31.
> Against the threats
> Of malice, or of sorcery, or that power
> Which erring men call chance, this I hold firm;—
> Virtue may be assail'd, but never hurt. Milton.

4. What fortune may bring; success or misfortune; fortune. 'If it be thy chance to kill me.' Shak.

> How will the country for these woful chances
> Misthink the king. Shak.
> Many a chance the years beget. Tennyson.

5. Possibility of an occurrence; opportunity.

> I would set my life on any chance
> To mend it or be rid on't. Shak.
> Your ladyship may have a chance to escape this address. Swift.

—Theory or doctrine of chances. See under PROBABILITY.

Chance (chans), v.i. To happen; to fall out; to come or arrive without design or expectation.

> Ah, Casca, tell us what hath chanced to-day. Shak.
> To be wroth with one we love,
> Doth work like madness on the brain.
> And thus it chanced, as I divine,
> With Roland and Sir Leoline. Coleridge.

This verb is sometimes used impersonally, as in the expression, 'how chances it.' Sometimes the 'it' is omitted.

> How chances it they travel? Shak.
> How chance the king comes with so small a train? Shak.

Chance (chans), v.t. To put under the influence of chance; to risk; to hazard; as, the thing may be dangerous, but I will chance it.

Chance (chans), a. Happening by chance; casual.

> They met like chance companions on the way.
> Dryden.

Chance (chans), adv. By chance; perchance.

> If chance by lowly contemplation led,
> Some kindred spirit shall enquire thy fate. Gray.

Chanceable† (chans'a-bl), a. Accidental; casual; fortuitous. Latimer; Sir P. Sidney.

Chanceably† (chans'a-bli), adv. Casually; by chance. Sir P. Sidney.

Chance-comer (chans'kum-ėr), n. One who comes by chance; an accidental or unexpected comer or visitor. Dryden; Tennyson.

Chanceful (chans'fųl), a. Full of chances or accidents; hazardous. [Rare and poetical.]

> All are not lost who join in chanceful war.
> J. Baillie.

Chancel (chan'sel), n. [So named from being railed off from the rest of the church by lattice-work — L. cancelli. See CANCEL.] 1. That part of the choir of a church between the altar or communion table and the balustrade or railing that incloses it, or that part where the altar is placed; formerly inclosed with lattices or cross-bars, as now with rails. — 2. An inclosed space railed off in courts of judicature.

Chancellary (chan'sel-la-ri), n. Same as Chancery, 2.

Chancellor (chan'sel-ėr), n. [L.L. cancellarius, from L. cancelli, lattice-work, a lattice-work railing, the name being given on account of the chancellor formerly standing ad cancellos (at the latticed railing), to receive petitions of suitors, and acting as intermediaries between them and the judge.] Originally, a chief notary or scribe under the Roman emperors; but in England, in later times, an officer invested with judicial powers, and particularly with the superintendence of all charters, letters, and other official writings of the crown that require to be solemnly authenticated. Hence this officer became the keeper of the great seal. From the Roman Empire this office passed to the Church, and hence every bishop has his chancellor. In France, a secretary, particularly of an embassy, is, in some cases, called a chancellor. In the new German Empire the chancellor (Reichskanzler) is the president of the Federal Council, and has the general conduct of the imperial administration. In the United States, a chancellor is the judge of a court of chancery or equity, established by statute. In Scrip. a master of the decrees, or president of the council. Ezra iv. 8. — The lord high chancellor of Great Britain, or keeper of the great seal, is the highest officer of the crown, and after the princes of the blood royal the first lay subject. He is a cabinet minister and privy councillor by his office, and prolocutor of the House of Lords by prescription. To him belongs the appointment of all justices of the peace; he is keeper of the sovereign's conscience, visitor of all hospitals and colleges founded by the king, guardian of all charitable uses, and judge of the High Court of Chancery. — Chancellor of a bishop or of a diocese, the vicar-general to the bishop, who holds his courts and directs and assists him in matters of ecclesiastical law. — Chancellor of a cathedral is an officer who arranges the celebration of religious services, hears lessons and lectures in the church, by himself or his vicar, applies the seal, writes letters of the chapter, keeps the books, &c. — Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, an officer who presides either in person or by deputy in the court of the Duchy of Lancaster concerning all matters of equity, relating to lands holden of the king (queen) in right of the Duchy of Lancaster. — Chancellor of the exchequer, the highest finance minister of the British government. This office is, from its nature, intrusted to a commoner. It is sometimes held along with that of first lord of the treasury, the latter title always being that of the premier. The chancellor of the exchequer was formerly a judge ex officio in the equity department of the Court of Exchequer, taking precedence of all the barons, but when the equitable jurisdiction of this court was transferred by 5 Viet. v. to the Court of Chancery, his judicial functions became obsolete. — Chancellor of a jury, in Scotland, is the preses or foreman of the jury, who announces the verdict, when it is a verbal one, and who delivers it in, and along with the clerk subscribes it in the name of the jury, when it is in writing. — Chancellor of the order of the Garter, and other military orders, is an officer who seals the commissions and mandates of the chapter and assembly of the knights, keeps the register of their proceedings, and delivers their acts under the seal of their order. — Chancellor of a university, the highest honorary official in the university, from whom the degrees are regarded as proceeding. The post in this country is usually occupied by a nobleman or other person of rank.

Chancellorship (chan'sel-ėr-ship), n. The office of a chancellor; the time during which one is chancellor.

Chancel-screen (chan'sel-skrēn), n. The screen or railing separating the chancel from the body of the church. It is often richly carved and adorned.

Chancel-table (chan'sel-tā-bl), n. An altar or communion table.

Chance-medley (chans'med-li), n. [From chance, and medley; O.Fr. meslee, a fray, a mêlée or mellay: not the same as chaud-medley.] 1. In law, originally a term signifying a casual affray or riot, accompanied with violence, and without deliberate or preconceived malice, but applied at present to a particular kind of homicide, viz., the killing of another in self-defence, upon a sudden and unpremeditated encounter. — 2. Haphazard mixture. Milton.

Chancery (chan'se-ri), n. [Modified from older chancelry, from Fr. chancellerie, L.L. cancellaria, from cancelli, lattice-work. See CHANCELLOR.] 1. In England, formerly the highest court of justice next to parliament, but since 1873 a division of the High Court of Justice, which is itself one of the two departments of the Supreme Court of Judicature. It formerly consisted of two distinct tribunals: one ordinary, being a court of common law; the other extraordinary, being a court of equity. The ordinary legal jurisdiction of chancery embraced the issuing of writs for a new parliament; of pleas of scire facias to repeal letters-patent, and of all original writs. It issued writs of habeas corpus, and inquired into charitable uses, while the lord-chancellor (the president of the court), together with the lords-justices of appeal, had exclusive authority over the property and persons of idiots and lunatics. Appeals in bankruptcy were heard by the court of appeal in chancery. The extraordinary court, or court of equity, proceeded upon rules of equity and conscience, moderated the rigour of the common law, giving relief in cases where there was no remedy in the common-law courts. The court of appeal in chancery no longer exists, its functions being transferred to the court of appeal; and the jurisdiction in respect of lunatics is vested in such judges of the High Court of Justice or the court of appeal as the crown may appoint. 2. In Scotland, an office in the general register-house of Edinburgh, managed by the director of chancery and his deputies. In it are recorded charters, patents of dignities, gifts of office, remissions, legitimations, and all other writs appointed to pass the great or the quarter seal. All writs passing through chancery are recorded before they are given out to be sealed. Called also Chancellary. —3. In the United States, a court of equity. —Inns of chancery. See INN.

Often used figuratively; as, the chase of pleasure, profit, fame, &c. 'Mad chase of fame.' Dryden.—2. That which is pursued or hunted; specifically, a vessel pursued by another.

> Nay, Warwick! single out some other chase,
> For I myself will hunt this deer to death. Shak.

3. An open piece of ground or place well stored with wild beasts or game, and belonging to a private proprietor: said properly to differ from a forest, which is not private property, and is invested with privileges; and from a park, which is inclosed. [In this sense often written chace.]

> A forest hath laws of her own, to take cognizance of all trespasses; she hath also her peculiar officers, as foresters, verderers, agisters, &c.; whereas a chase or park hath only keepers or woodwards. Howell.

4. A term in the game of tennis; the spot where a ball falls, beyond which an opponent must strike his ball in order to gain a point.—To give chase to, to pursue.—Beasts of the chase, in law, properly, the buck, doe, fox, marten, and roe; but in a common and legal sense the term extends to all wild beasts of venery and hunting.

Chase (chās), n. [Fr. châsse, from L. capsa, box, case. Case, for holding things, is a form of the same word.] 1. In printing, an iron frame used by printers to confine types when set in columns or pages.—2. The part of a gun between the trunnions and the swell of the muzzle, or in modern guns in which the muzzle has no swell, the whole of that part of a gun which is in front of the trunnions.—3. A wide groove; specifically, in ship-building, a long sloping mortise. See CHASE-MORTISE.—4. In ship-building, that kind of joint by which the overlapping joint of clinker-built boats is gradually converted at the stem and stern into a flush-joint, as in carvel-built boats.

Chase (chās), v.t. [Shortened from enchase.] 1. To enchase (which see).—2. To cut, so as to make a screw; to cut the thread of a screw.

Chase-gun (chās'gun), n. In war-ships, a gun used in chasing an enemy, or in defending a ship when chased; a chaser.

Chase-mortise (chās'mor-tis), n. A manner of mortising transverse pieces into parallel timbers already fixed. One end of the transverse piece is mortised into one of the parallel pieces, and a long mortise being cut in the other parallel piece, the other end of the transverse piece is let into it by making it radiate on its already mortised end. In this way ceiling joists are fixed to the bridging joists.

Chaser (chās'ėr), n. 1. One who chases; a pursuer; a driver; a hunter.—2. Naut. (a) a vessel which pursues another. (b) A chase-gun; a gun in a vessel for firing when in chase or being chased; called a bow-chaser when pointed from the bow, and a stern-chaser when from the stern.

Chastye,† v.t. To chastise.

Chasuble (chas'ū-bl), n. [Fr. chasuble, from

A, Ancient form of Chasuble: 1, Apparel of the neck, 2 2 2 2, Chasuble. 3 3, Orphreys of the chasuble. 4, The stole. 5 5, The alb. 6, Apparel of the alb. 7, The maniple.
B, Modern form of Chasuble.

Med. L. casubula, a dim. of L. casula, a little cottage, and used by Isidore of Seville in sense of a priest's hooded garment, which covers him like a little house—a dim. of casa, a cottage.] In its first use and under its Latin name of casula, the chasuble was a circular garment of one piece, without sleeves or opening in front, with a hole in the centre for the head to pass through, of various materials, frequently of wool, worn by the common people, monks, &c., as a covering for the whole person, being, when furnished with a hood, at once hat and mantle. From its being retained by the clergy after other people had discarded it, it came to be regarded as a characteristic of a cleric, and in the ninth century it was the term applied to the outer vestment worn in the holy offices, and it is now regarded as the principal vestment of the Roman Catholic priest, being put on by him over the alb and stole before celebrating mass. Although the vestment was originally circular, it has been gradually retrenched during the last two centuries till it has become oblong, hanging down before and behind, but leaving the arms free. The chasuble is now made of rich materials, as silk, velvet, cloth of gold, and has a cross embroidered on the back. The Greeks still retain the circular form of the chasuble. Called also Chasible and Chesible.

Chat (chat), v.i. pret. & pp. chatted; ppr. chatting. [An abbreviated form of chatter (which see).] To talk idly or in a familiar manner; to talk without form or ceremony. 'To chat awhile on their adventures passed.' Dryden.

Cheese (chēz), n. [A. Sax. cēse, cȳse, cheese; derived like G. käse, D. kaas, from L. caseus, cheese.] 1. The curd or caseine of milk, coagulated by rennet or some acid, separated from the serum or whey, and pressed in a vat, hoop, or mould. All the acids separate the cheese from the whey; neutral salts, and likewise all earthy and metallic salts, produce the same effect. But what answers best is rennet, which is made by macerating in water a piece of the last stomach of a calf, salted and dried for this purpose. The flowers of the Galium verum, or yellow lady's bed-straw, and the juice of the fig-tree very readily coagulate milk. There are a great many kinds of cheese, which differ from one another according to the quality of the milk employed and the mode of preparation. Soft cheeses, such as cream-cheese, Bath and Yorkshire cheese, will not keep long, and are therefore used as soon as made. Hard cheeses, as Cheshire, Gloucester, Cheddar, Parmesan, and Dutch, are capable of being kept a long time. There is also an intermediate class, as Gruyère, Stilton, &c. Cheese is composed of from 30 to 50 per cent of water, 3 to 5 per cent of nitrogen, 18 to 30 per cent of fat, and 4 to 6 per cent of mineral matter.—2. A mass of pomace or ground apples pressed together in the form of a cheese.—3. [Slang.] Anything good or first-rate in quality; anything genuine, advantageous, or pleasant. In this sense probably from the Gypsy vocabulary, and derived from Hindu and Persian chiz, a thing. Leland, however, while acknowledging it to be a true Gypsy word, refers it rather to French chose, a thing, which is from Latin causa.

Cheese-cake (chēz'kāk), n. 1. A cake filled with a jelly made of soft curds, sugar, and butter.—2. A small cake made in various ways and with a variety of different ingredients; as, lemon cheese-cake, orange cheese-cake, apple cheese-cake, &c.

Cheese-fly (chēz'fli), n. A small black dipterous insect bred in cheese, the Piophila casei, of the family Muscidæ, the same to which the house-fly, blow-fly, &c., belong. It has a very extensible ovipositor, which it can sink to a great depth in the cracks of cheese, and lay its eggs there. The maggot, well known as the cheese-hopper, is furnished with two horny claw-shaped mandibles, which it uses both for digging into the cheese and for moving itself, having no feet. It has two pairs of spiracles, one pair near the head and another near the tail, so that when one is obstructed the other can be used. Its leaps are performed by a jerk, first bringing itself into a circular attitude, when it can project itself twenty to thirty times its own length.

Cheironectes (kī-rō-nek'tēz), n. [Gr. cheir, the hand, and nēchō, to swim.] 1. A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, having the pectoral fins supported, like short feet, upon peduncles, by means of which they are enabled to creep over mud and sand when left dry by the receding tide, and also to take short leaps like a frog, whence it is called frog-fish, as well as hand-fish. They are found in the estuaries of the north-east of Australia. From the structure of their gills they can live out of the water for two or three days.—2. The name given by Illiger to a Brazilian genus of opossums, in which the hinder-hands are webbed. Only one species is known, namely, C. variegatus, or C. Yapock (sometimes called the Yapock opossum, from the river of that name), a spotted marsupial quadruped, found in some parts of South America.

Cheiropodist (kī-rop'od-ist), n. Same as Chiropodist.

Cheiropter (kī-rop'tėr), n. A mammal of the order Cheiroptera.

Cheiroptera (kī-rop'tėr-a), n. pl. [Gr. cheir, the hand, and pteron, wing.] An order of mammals—the bats—nearly equivalent to the Linnæan genus Vespertilio. They are characterized by the elongation of all the fingers, save the thumb, for the support of a membrane which stretches along the sides of the body, and is attached to the posterior limbs, in the majority passing across between the hind limbs and tail. They have thus the power of sustained flight. See BAT.

Cheiropterous (kī-rop'tėr-us), a. Belonging to the Cheiroptera or bat tribe; furnished with elongated fingers or toes, for the expansion of membranes which serve as wings.

Cheirostemon (kī-rō-stē'mon), n. [Gr. cheir, the hand, and stēmon, a stamen.] A genus of plants, nat. order Malvaceæ or Sterculiaceæ. It contains a single species, C. platanoides (the hand-flower tree of Mexico). It is a tall tree with large lobed leaves and remarkable flowers, about 2 inches across, without a corolla, but with a coloured calyx, and the bright red stamens divided for about one-third of their length into five linear curved lobes, having some resemblance to the human hand.

Cheirotes (kī-rō'tēz), n. [Gr. cheirōtēs, provided with hands, from cheir, a hand.] A genus of lizards forming the family Cheirotidæ, and containing but one species, C. canaliculatus, an animal, so far as known, of subterranean habits like the amphisbæna. It, however, differs from the other members of the order Amphisbænia in having external limbs, which consist of two small and slightly developed fore-legs, just behind the head, nearly in the place where the ears might be expected. It is about the thickness of a human little finger, and from 8 to 10 inches long.

Cheirotherium (kī-rō-thē'ri-um), n. [Gr. cheir, the hand, and thērion, a wild beast.] Lit. hand-beast; in geol. a name given to the great unknown animal that formed the larger footsteps upon the slabs of the trias, or upper new red sandstone, and which bear a resemblance to the human hand. It is supposed to be identical with the newt-like labyrinthodon.

Chekelatoun,† n. A kind of rich cloth. See CHECKLATON.

Cheke-mate.† Same as Check-mate. Chaucer.

Chekere.† Same as Checker. Chaucer.

Chekmak (chek'mak), n. A Turkish fabric of mixed silk and cotton, with golden threads interwoven.

Chekoa (chē'kō-a), n. Chinese porcelain clay.

Chela (kē'la), n. pl. Chelæ (kē'lē). [Gr. chēlē, a claw.] One of the prehensile claws with which some of the limbs are terminated in certain crustacea, such as the crab, lobster, &c.

Chelate (kē'lāt), a. Same as Cheliferous.

Chelaundre,† n. [Fr. calandre, It. calandra.] A kind of lark; the calandra. Romaunt of the Rose.

Chele,† n. Chill; cold. 'In many a chele and heat.' Gower.

Chele (kē'lē), n. Same as Chela.

Chelicera (kē-lis'ėr-a), n. pl. Cheliceræ (kē-lis'ėr-ē). [Gr. chēlē, a claw, and keras, a horn.] A name given to the prehensile claws of the scorpion and spider, which are the homologues of antennæ.

Chelididæ, Chelydidæ (kē-lid'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. chelys, a tortoise, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of tortoises (sometimes called frog-tortoises), agreeing generally in their form and the structure of their feet with the marsh-tortoises, except that the carapace is imperfectly ossified, and the head and limbs are not completely retractile. The mouth is surrounded by soft lips, and the nose usually elongated into a proboscis.

Chelidonium (kel-i-dō'ni-um), n. [Gr. chelidonion, from chelidōn, a swallow.] Celandine, a genus of plants, nat. order Papaveraceæ. One of the two known species is a native of waste grounds in the south of England (C. majus). It is a glaucous annual, with lobed leaves, small yellow flowers, and a long pod. It abounds in an acrid yellow juice, sometimes used as a caustic to destroy warts.

Chelifer (kel'i-fėr), n. [Gr. chēlē, a claw, and L. fero, to carry.] A genus of Arachnidæ, remarkable for the resemblance which the species bear to scorpions. See BOOK-SCORPION.

Cheliferous (kē-lif'ėr-us), a. [L. chela, a claw, and fero, to bear.] Furnished with chelæ, as a lobster, a crab, &c.

Cheliform (kel'i-form), a. [L. chela, a claw, and forma, form.] Having the form of a chela or prehensile claw, like those of the lobster, crab, &c.

Chelingue (she-ling'), n. A clumsy kind of boat used on the coast of Coromandel. Called also Masoola-boat (which see).

Chelodine (kel'ō-dīn), n. [Gr. chelys, a tortoise.] An Australian river tortoise, having a long, flexible neck, and a flat, narrow, and pointed head. It is a very active animal, traversing with considerable speed the pools and rivers in which it finds its fishy prey.

Cheloid (kel'oid), n. [Gr. chelys, a tortoise, and eidos, appearance.] Same as Cancroid. Dunglison.

Chelone (kē-lō'nē), n. [Gr. chelōnē, a tortoise.] 1. In bot. a beautiful genus of herbaceous plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. The broad keeled upper lip and nearly shut mouth of the corolla suggested the name. The species are perennials, with large white or purple flowers. They are natives of America, but are frequent in our gardens. They are popularly called tortoise-flower, shell-flower, and snake-head. 2. In zool. a genus of turtles, family Chelonidæ, represented by the green turtle (Chelone mydas or viridis).

Chelonia (kē-lō'ni-a), n. pl. [Gr. chelōnē, a tortoise.] An order of reptiles, distinguished by the body being inclosed in a double shell, out of which the head, tail, and four extremities protrude, including the various species of tortoise and turtle. The order is divided into five families—the Chelididæ, or frog tortoises; Testudinidæ, or land tortoises; Emydæ, the terrapins or fresh-water tortoises; Trionychidæ, the mud turtles or soft tortoises; Chelonidæ, or sea turtles. See TORTOISE, TURTLE.

Chelonian (kē-lō'ni-an), a. [Gr. chelōnē, a tortoise.] Pertaining to or designating animals of the tortoise kind.

Chelonian (kē-lō'ni-an), n. A member of the order Chelonia.

Chelonidæ, Cheloniidæ (kē-lon'i-dē, kē-lō-ni'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. chelōnē, a tortoise, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of chelonian reptiles, distinguished by the peculiar modification of the feet for swimming; the turtles. See TURTLE.

Cheluridæ (kē-lū'ri-dē), n. pl. [Gr. chelē, a claw, oura, a tail, and eidos, resemblance.] The wood-boring shrimps, a family of marine shrimps nearly as destructive to timber as the ship-worm itself by boring tunnels under the surface.

Chelydidæ. See CHELIDIDÆ.

Chelys (kē'lis), n. [Gr., a tortoise.] A genus of turtles, type of the family Chelididæ. See MATAMATA.

Chemic (kem'ik), n. 1.† A chemist or alchemist.—2. In bleaching, a dilute solution of chloride of lime.

Chemic (kem'ik), v.t. pret. & pp. chemicked; ppr. chemicking. In bleaching, to steep, as cotton goods, in a dilute solution of chloride of lime in stone vats, the liquor being pumped up and strained through the goods until the action is complete.

Chemic (kem'ik), a. Same as Chemical, but used chiefly in poetry.

Chemical (kem'ik-al), a. [See CHEMISTRY.] 1. Pertaining to chemistry; as, a chemical experiment.—2. Pertaining to the phenomena with which chemistry deals and to the laws by which they are regulated; as, chemical affinity; chemical combinations; chemical changes.—Chemical affinity, chemical attraction, and elective attraction, are different names for that action by which the particles of one class of bodies, when presented to those of certain other classes, conjoin to form new compounds, making apparently a choice or election of those with which they unite. Chemical attraction, like cohesion, acts only at insensible distances, and thus differs entirely from the attraction of gravitation. It is distinguished from cohesion by being exerted between dissimilar particles only, while cohesion unites similar particles only. Chemical combination always takes place in definite proportions, that is, each element has a certain definite combining proportion, whereas mere mixture or solution may occur with very varying amounts of the same substances; the properties of the product or products of chemical action are not the mean of the properties of the substances acted upon, as is the case with mere mechanical actions; and, further, chemical action is always attended with an alteration in the temperature of the substances acted on, generally with an evolution of heat. Chemical action may take place between two elements whereby a new compound is produced, or it may cause the decomposition of a compound into two or more elementary bodies; or again, two compounds may react on one another, and by an interchange of elements produce a series of new compounds. The power of chemical force is very great, and it varies under different circumstances; thus, the force with which two bodies, say A and B, unite, is much greater than that with which A unites with a third body C under the same circumstances, but the circumstances under which combination takes place often alters entirely the relative magnitude or strength of the chemical action.—Chemical analysis, a term applied to the resolution of compound bodies into their elements. It is either qualitative or quantitative. Qualitative analysis consists in the determination of the component parts merely as respects their nature, and without regard to their relative proportions. Quantitative analysis consists in the determination not merely of the components of a compound, but their relative proportions.—Chemical combination, that intimate union of two substances, whether fluid or solid, which forms a compound differing in one or more of its essential qualities from either of the constituent bodies.—Chemical decomposition, the separation of the component parts of bodies from each other, or the resolution of compounds into their elements. See DECOMPOSITION.—Chemical equivalents. See EQUIVALENT.—Chemical formulæ, symbolic expressions employed to denote the composition of bodies. In the formulæ now generally adopted by chemists the names of elementary substances are indicated by the first letter or letters of their names, and to express the compounds of these the letters are arranged together, and small numbers are placed at each letter to indicate how many atoms or smaller combining parts of this element exist in the compound. Thus, H means 1 atom of hydrogen, H_2O means 2 atoms of hydrogen united with 1 of oxygen, forming the compound water; K H O means 1 atom of potassium (kalium), 1 of hydrogen, and 1 of oxygen, forming the compound caustic potash; and so on. If a number is placed at the beginning of the formula it multiplies the entire formula; thus, $2H_2O$ means 2 parts or 2 molecules of water. See ATOM and MOLECULE.—Mechanical, Chemical. See under MECHANICAL.

Chemical (kem'ik-al), n. A substance used to produce chemical effects; a chemical agent; as, the manufacture of chemicals.

Chemically (kem'ik-al-li), adv. In a chemical manner; according to chemical principles; by chemical process or operation.

Chemiglyphic (kem-i-glif'ik), a. [Gr. chemi- in chemistry, and glyphein, to engrave.] A term applied to anything engraved by the agency of the galvanic battery.

Chemise (she-mēz'), n. [Fr. chemise, L.L. camisia, a shirt, from Ar. qamis, a shirt, an under-garment of linen.] 1. A shift or under-garment worn by females.—2. A wall that lines the face of an earthwork; a breast-wall.

Chemisette (shem-i-zet'), n. [Fr.] A short under-garment worn on the breast over the chemise.

Chemism (kem'izm), n. Chemical power, influence, or effects. [Rare.]

> How far their ready ignition on amorphous phosphorus is due to chemism or to electricity remains to be proved. Preece.

Chemist (kem'ist), n. [Shortened from alchemist. See CHEMISTRY.] 1.† An alchemist. 2. A person versed in chemistry; a student of chemistry; one whose business is to make chemical examinations or investigations.—3. One who deals in drugs and medicines.—Chemist and druggist, one who is registered as such under the act of July 31, 1868, relating to the sale of poisons. Chemists and druggists are eligible as members of the Pharmaceutical Society, but are not entitled to a place on the register as pharmaceutical chemists.—Pharmaceutical chemist, a person who, after passing a certain examination, is registered as such by the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. Applicants for the title are tested by competent examiners of the society in Latin, botany, materia medica, and pharmaceutical and general chemistry, with other cognate subjects, but not including medicine, surgery, or midwifery.

Chemistical† (kem-ist'ik-al), a. Relating to chemistry. Burton.

Chemistry (kem'ist-ri), n. [From chemist, a shortened form of alchemist, from alchemy, alchymy, O. Fr. alchemie, from Ar. al, the, and qīmīā, chemistry, from L. Gr. chēmeia, chemistry, from Gr. cheō, to pour, to drop.] The science which investigates matter in so far as it is acted upon by the force called chemical, the distinguishing feature of chemical action being the production of a substance or substances of quite different properties from the bodies from which they are produced. In thus studying the changes which matter undergoes the chemist arrives at a classification of all matter into elements, that is, substances which he is unable to decompose, and compounds, or substances which can be broken up into simpler bodies. It becomes necessary, therefore, for the chemist to study the properties, modes of preparation, and mutual actions of both elements and compounds; and he must not overlook the relations of these bodies to physical forces other than chemical, such as heat, light, &c. A consideration of the laws which govern chemical actions, and of the bearing of these upon the general theories of matter constitutes theoretical (or pure) chemistry, while practical (or applied) chemistry is more concerned with the modes of preparing chemical substances, of analyzing these, or of finding useful applications for such substances in the arts and manufactures. Chemistry also is often divided into such branches as organic chemistry, which has to do with organized bodies (animals and plants), inorganic chemistry, with inorganic bodies, agricultural chemistry, medical chemistry, &c. Chemistry is subservient to the various arts of life, and the several branches of manufacture which are carried on in every civilized state. Dyeing, bleaching, tanning, glass-making, the working and composition of metals, &c., are all chemical processes, and, as a science, chemistry is connected with a vast number of the phenomena of nature. It has been called in to the aid of the culinary arts; and its high importance in medicine has been long and universally acknowledged. Formerly and still sometimes written Chymistry. The same is the case also with Chemist, Chemical.

Chemitype, Chemitypy (kem'i-tīp, kem'i-ti-pi), n. [Chemi- in chemistry and type.] A process for obtaining casts in relief from engravings. A polished zinc plate is covered with an etching ground, on which the design is etched with a point and bitten in with dilute aqua fortis. The etching ground is removed, and every particle of the acid well cleaned off. The plate, covered by the filings of a fusible metal, is heated until the metal has melted and filled the engraving. When cold it is scraped away to the level of the zinc plate in such a manner that none of it remains except what has entered the engraved lines. The plate is next submitted to the action of a weak solution of muriatic acid; and, as the one of these metals is negative and the other positive, the zinc alone is eaten away by the acid, so that the fusible metal which has entered into the hollows of the engraving is left in relief, and may be printed from by means of the typographic press. Chemitype is particularly adapted for producing maps.

Chemosis (kē-mō'sis), n. [Gr. chēmē, an aperture, from the appearance produced in the eye by this affection.] An affection of the eye in which the conjunctiva is elevated above the transparent cornea.

Cheng.—Carl Engel's Musical Instruments.

Chemy (kem'i), n. Chemistry. Dr. G. Cheyne. [Rare.]

Cheng (cheng), n. A Chinese musical instrument, consisting of a series of tubes having free reeds. It is held in the hand and blown into by the mouth. The tubes serve only to strengthen the sound, and could be dispensed with, the pitch of the sounds being determined by the length and thickness of the reeds. The introduction of this instrument into Europe led to the invention of the accordion, harmonium, and other free-reed instruments.

Chenille (she-nēl'), n. [Fr., a caterpillar.] A tufted cord of silk or worsted, somewhat resembling a caterpillar, used for making hair nets, &c.

Chenopodiaceæ (kē-nō-pod'i-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. [After the typical genus Chenopodium.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens, consisting of more or less succulent herbs or shrubs, belonging to about eighty genera and 600 species. They are mostly innocent weeds, but several are employed as pot-herbs, such as spinach and beet, and others for the manufacture of soda.

Chenopodium (kē-nō-pod'i-um), n. [Gr. chēn. chēnos, a goose, and pous, podos, foot.] A genus of variable herbs, nat. order Chenopodiaceæ. They are weedy plants, common in waste places, and known by the names of goosefoot, fat-hen, good King Henry, &c. Nine species are found in Britain.

Chepe † (chēp), n. 1. A market.—2. Cheapness. See CHEAP, n.

Chepe † (chēp), v.t. To cheapen; to buy. Chaucer.

Chepynge† (chēp'ing), n. A market. Piers Plowman; Wickliffe.

Cheque (chek), n. [From chequer or exchequer, in old sense of banker's or money-changer's office or counter. See EXCHEQUER, CHECK.] An order for money drawn on a banker or on the cashier of a bank, payable to the bearer.

Cheque-book (chek'bụk), n. A book containing blank bank-cheques.

Chequer, Checker (chek'ėr), n. [From O. Fr. eschequier, Mod. Fr. échiquier, a chess-board, an exchequer, from O. Fr. eschecs, chess. See CHECK, CHESS.] 1.† A chess or draught board.—2. One of the squares of a chequered pattern; the pattern itself.—3. Chequer-work (which see).—4.† An exchequer or treasury. 'Tribute that the swoln floods render into her chequer.' W. Browne. 5. pl. In arch. stones in the facings of walls which have all their thin joints continued in straight lines without interruption or breaking joints, thus presenting the appearance of chequer-work.—6. pl. The game of draughts. (In this sense, which is far more common in America than England, more commonly written Checkers.)—7. A piece in this game. [American.]—8. A common name (now used in the plural and rather as a proper name) for such inns as had their sign-board marked with chequers, probably to announce that draughts and backgammon were played within. It is a curious fact that several houses marked with signs of this kind have been exhumed in Pompeii.

> Story! God bless you, I have none to tell, sir,
> Only last night a-drinking at the Chequers,
> This poor old hat and breeches, as you see, were > Torn in a scuffle. Canning.

Chequer, Checker (chek'ėr), v.t. 1. To mark with little squares, like a chess-board, by lines or stripes of different colours; to mark with different colours.

> The gray-ey'd morn smiles on the frowning night,
> Checkering the eastern clouds with streaks of light. Shak.

2. Fig. to variegate with different qualities, scenes, or events; to diversify; to impart variety to.

> Our minds are, as it were, chequered with truth and falsehood. Addison.

> We cannot but reverence the romantic piety which chequers the story of the violence and avarice of the conquistadors. Is. Taylor.

Chequer-berry (chek'ėr-be-ri), n. 1. A handsome little creeping plant, the Mitchella repens, growing in North America.—2. The American wintergreen (Gaultheria procumbens).

Chequer-board (chek'ėr-bōrd), n. A board on which chequers or draughts are played.

Chequer-chamber † (chek'ėr-chām-bėr), n. Abbreviation of Exchequer-chamber.

Chequered, Checkered (chek'ėrd), p. and a. 1. Marked with squares or chequers like a chess-board; exhibiting squares of different colours; varied with a play of different colours. 'The snake with shining checker'd slough.' Shak. 'Dancing in the chequer'd shade.' Milton.—2. Fig. variegated with different qualities, scenes, or events; crossed with good and bad fortune. 'His chequered life.' Macaulay.

> Yet unless I greatly deceive myself, the general effects of this chequered narrative will be to excite thankfulness in all religious minds and hope in the breasts of all parties. Macaulay.

Chequer-roll (chek'ėr-rōl), n. See CHECK, 11.

Chequer-work, Checker-work (chek'ėr-wėrk), n. Chequered work; work exhibiting chequers or squares of varied colour or materials; work consisting of cross lines; fig. an aggregate of vicissitudes. 'A chequer-work of beam and shade.' Tennyson.

> Nets of checker-work and wreaths of chain-work for the chapiters which were upon the top of the pillars. 1 Ki. vii. 17.

> How strange a chequer-work of Providence is the life of man! Defoe.

Chequin,† n. Same as Zequin or Sequin.

Chequy, Chequey (chek'i), a. In her. checky (which see).

Cherch,† n. A church. Chaucer.

Chere† (chēr), n. The face; visage; countenance; appearance; entertainment; good cheer. See CHEER.

Cherice,† v.t. To cherish.

Cherif, n. Same as Shereef.

Cherimoyer (cher-i-moi'ėr), n. [Fr. chérimolier, a corruption of Cherimoles, the name of the fruit in Peru.] The fruit of Anona Cherimolia, a native of Peru. It is a heart-shaped fruit with a scaly exterior and numerous seeds, buried in a delicious pulp. It is as much esteemed in the western parts of South America as the custard-apple, to which it bears a great resemblance, is in the West Indies. The cherimoyer is now cultivated in various tropical countries. Also written Chirimoya.

Cherish (cher'ish), v.t. [O.Fr. cherir, cherissant (Fr. chérir, chérissant), to hold dear, from cher, L. carus, dear.] 1. To treat with tenderness and affection; to take care of; to foster; to nurture; to support and encourage; to comfort.

We were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children. 1 Thes. ii. 7.

You that do abet him in this kind
Cherish rebellion and are rebels all. Shak.

For what doth cherish weeds but gentle air? Shak.

2. To hold as dear; to indulge and encourage in the mind; to harbour; to cling to; as, to cherish the principles of virtue; to cherish an evil passion. 'Which bounteous gift thou should'st in bounty cherish.' Shak. 'How to cherish such high deeds.' Shak. 'To cherish virtue and humanity.' Burke.

To foster, to cherish, to harbour, to indulge. To foster is to sustain and nourish with care and effort. To cherish is to hold and treat as dear. To harbour is to provide with shelter and protection, so as to give opportunity for working to something that might be and often ought to be excluded. To indulge is to treat with sweetness. Angus.

Cherisher (cher'ish-ėr), n. One who cherishes; an encourager; a supporter. 'The cherisher of my flesh and blood.' Shak.

Cherishingly (cher'ish-ing-li), adv. In an affectionate or cherishing manner.

Cherishment† (cher'ish-ment), n. Encouragement; comfort. Spenser.

Cherl,† n. A churl. Chaucer.

Cherlish,† a. Churlish. Chaucer.

Chermany (chėr'ma-ni), n. In the Southern States of America, the equivalent of baseball. Scribner's Monthly.

Chermes (kėr'mēz), n. Same as Kermes.

Cheroot (shē-rōt'), n. A kind of cigar of a cylindrical or often somewhat tapering shape, with both ends cut square off, in this respect differing from a cigar, which has one end pointed. Either end may be lighted. Written also Sheroot.

Cherry (che'ri), n. [O.E. cheri, chiri, from Fr. cerise, L. cerasus, a cherry, from Gr. kerasos, a cherry. 'Cheri or chiri was a corruption of cheris or chiris, the final s being mistaken for the plural inflection; the same mistake occurs in several other words, notably in pea as shortened from pease (L. pisum).' Skeat. That the tree received its name from the town of Cerasus in Pontus is very doubtful; possibly the derivation was the other way.] 1. The fruit of species of Cerasus, which is commonly regarded as a sub-genus of Prunus; a tree producing this fruit. The cultivated varieties probably belong to two species, C. avium and C. vulgaris. They are numerous, as the red or garden cherry, the red heart, the white heart, the black cherry, the black heart, and several others. The fruit is a pulpy drupe inclosing a one-seeded smooth stone. It is related that this fruit or a cultivated variety of it was brought from Cerasus in Pontus to Italy after the defeat of Mithridates by Lucullus, about B.C. 70, and introduced into England by the Romans about 120 years afterward, A.D. 55.—Barbadoes cherry is the fruit of Malpighia urens. The berries are red, cherry-shaped, acid, and eatable.—Bird cherry is Prunus Padus.—Cornelian cherry is the fruit of Cornus mascula (cornel-tree or dog-wood). It is a small, acid, cherry-like eatable berry.—Dwarf cherry is the fruit of a Lonicera or honeysuckle.—Hottentot cherry is the fruit of Cassine Maurocenia. The fruit is a trispermous berry of a dark purple colour.—Mahaleb cherry, the fruit of Cerasus Mahaleb, of the south of Europe.—Marasca cherry. See MARASCA.—Winter cherry is the fruit of Rhysalis Alkekengi. It is a berry of the size of a small cherry, inclosed in an inflated bladder-like calyx. This name is also given to a species of Solanum.—2. A cordial composed of cherry juice and spirit, sweetened and diluted. The wild cherry is most generally used for this purpose, being steeped for some days in spirit, which extracts the juice of the fruit; the tincture is then sweetened and diluted to the taste. This cordial is moderately bitter and astringent. It is sometimes made of the mazard.

Cherry (che'ri), a. Like a red cherry in colour; red; ruddy; blooming; as, a cherry lip; cherry cheeks.

Shore's wife hath a pretty foot,
A cherry lip, a bonny eye, a passing pleasing tongue. Shak.

Cherry† (che'ri), v.t. To cherish. Spenser.

Cherry-bay (che'ri-bā), n. The laurel.

Cherry-bounce† (che'ri-bouns), n. An old popular drink, consisting of burned brandy in which cherries had been steeped, and sugar; or perhaps what is now termed Cherry-brandy.

Cherry-brandy (che'ri-bran-di), n. Brandy in which cherries have been steeped.

Cherry-cheeked (che'ri-chēkt), a. Having ruddy cheeks. 'Cherry-cheeked country girls.' Congreve.

Cherry-coal (che'ri-kōl), n. A soft coal, abounding in Staffordshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, near Glasgow, &c. Though resembling caking coal it does not cake in burning; but gives out a cheerful bright flame and needs no stirring.

Cherry-coloured (che'ri-kul-ėrd), a. Coloured like a cherry; cerise.

She wore one of her own round-ear'd caps, and over it a little straw-hat, lined with cherry-colour'd silk, and tied with a cherry-colour'd ribbon. Fielding.

Cherry-gum (che'ri-gum), n. Cerasin.

Cherry-laurel (che'ri-la-rel), n. The English name of Cerasus Lauro-cerasus, nat. order Rosaceæ, a native of Asia Minor. It is commonly called laurel, but must not be confounded with the sweet bay or other true species of Laurus. The leaves yield by distillation a hydrocyanated oil, nearly identical with that got from bitter almonds. The distilled water from the leaves is used in medicine in the same way as diluted hydrocyanic or prussic acid. It is poisonous in large doses.

Cherry-pepper (che'ri-pep-ėr), n. A species of capsicum (C. cerasiforme), whose fruit is small and cherry-shaped.

Cherry-pit (che'ri-pit), n. A child's play, in which cherry-stones are thrown into a hole.

'Tis not for gravity to play at cherry-pit with Satan. Shak.

Cherry-rum (che'ri-rum), n. Rum in which cherries have been steeped.

Cherry-stick (che'ri-stik), n. A tobacco-pipe tube made of the young stems of the Mahaleb cherry, bored and the reddish-brown bark retained. Sometimes these stems are five feet long, and as straight and smooth as if turned.

Cherry-stone (che'ri-stōn), n. The seed of the cherry.

Cherry-stoner (che'ri-stōn-ėr), n. One who or that which removes the stones from cherries; specifically, a domestic implement which works by introducing a forked prong into the fruit, driving the stone out of the pulp.

Cherry-tree (che'ri-trē), n. A tree producing cherries. The name is mostly given to the common cultivated trees and to that which produces the black wild cherry. The wood of the latter is valued for cabinet-work. See CHERRY.

Cherry-wine (che'ri-wīn), n. Wine made from cherries.

Chersonese (kėr'sō-nēz), n. [Gr. chersonēsos—chersos, land, or uncultivated land, and nēsos, an isle.] A peninsula; a tract of land of any indefinite extent which is nearly surrounded by water, but united to a larger tract by a neck of land or isthmus; as, the Cimbric Chersonese or Jutland; the Tauric Chersonese or Crimea; the Thracian Chersonese, the peninsula on the western side of the Hellespont. Formerly written also Chersoness.

The sea so circles there that it becomes a chersoness. Sir T. Herbert.

Chert (chėrt), n. [Probably Celtic; comp. Ir. ceart, a pebble.] A variety of quartz, called also Hornstone, Petrosilex, or Rock flint. It is less hard than common quartz; its fracture usually conchoidal and dull, sometimes splintery. It is more or less translucent. Its colours are numerous and usually dull. It is usually amorphous, sometimes globular or in nodules. It occurs often in veins, especially metallic, in primitive mountains. The name is also applied to other minerals besides hornstone. Thus those siliceous concretions which occur as nodules and layers in limestone rocks, like flints in chalk, are called chert. The Derbyshire miners apply the term black chert to a fusible mineral, whereas the hornstone above described is infusible.

Cherty (chėrt'i), a. Like chert; full of chert; flinty.

Cherub (cher'ub), n. pl. Cherubs (cher'ubz). The Hebrew plural Cherubim is also used, and sometimes the plural is written with an n. Cherubims and Cherubins as plurals are improper. [Heb. kerub.] 1. One of an order of angels variously represented at different times, but generally as winged spirits with a human countenance, and distinguished by their knowledge from the seraphs, whose distinctive quality is love. The first mention of cherubs is in Gen. iii. 24, where the figure is not described, but their office was, with a flaming sword, to keep or guard the way of the tree of life. The cherubs, in Ezekiel's vision, had each four heads or faces, the hands of a man, and wings. The four faces were the face of a bull, that of a man, that of a lion, and that of an eagle. They had the bodily form of a man. Ezek. iv. and x. In the celestial hierarchy cherubs are represented as spirits next in order to seraphs. The hieroglyphical and emblematical figures embroidered on the veils of the tabernacle are called cherubs of curious or skilful work. Ex. xxvi.—2. A beautiful child: so called because artists have generally represented cherubs as beautiful winged children. [In this sense the plural is always cherubs.]

Cherubic (che-rub'ik), a. Pertaining to or resembling cherubs; angelic. 'The cherubic host.' Milton.

Cherubical (che-rub'ik-al), a. Same as Cherubic. 'The cherubical angel.' Sheldon.

His chestnut curls clustered over his open brow. Disraeli.

Chestnut-tree (ches'nut-trē), n. Castanea

Chestnut (Castanea vesca).

vesca, a tree, nat. order Corylaceæ, which produces the chestnut. Probably a native of Asia Minor, it has long been cultivated in Europe, and was introduced into England perhaps by the Romans. It is one of our most ornamental large trees, growing freely in Britain, producing its flowers in July and its fruit (which is fully matured in Devonshire and even farther north) in the autumn. The chestnuts of commerce are imported from Spain and Italy, and the tree is often called the Spanish chestnut. The timber is not so highly prized as that of the oak, and is more valuable when young than when old. See CASTANEA.

Cheston (ches'ton), n. [Perhaps from a resemblance to the chestnut.] A species of plum.

Chest-rope (chest'rōp), n. Naut. a long boat-rope or warp. E. H. Knight.

Chest-saw (chest'są), n. A kind of hand-saw without a back. E. H. Knight.

Chetah (chē'ta), n. [Native name, meaning spotted.] The Felis jubata, or hunting leopard of India. Owing to the greater length of its limbs it exceeds the ordinary leopard in height. It has its specific name (jubata, crested or maned) from a short mane-like crest of hairs passing from the back of the head to the shoulders. When used for hunting it is hooded and placed in a car. When a herd of deer is seen, its keeper places its head in the proper direction and removes its hood. It slips from the car, and approaching its prey in a stealthy manner, springs on it at one bound. A variety is found in Africa, but it is put to no use.

Chettik (chet'tik), n. [Native name.] 1. A tree of Java, the Strychnos Tieute, yielding a very virulent poison.—2. The poison got from this tree, and known by the name of Upas Tieute. It owes its properties to its strychnine, which is an active poison, causing tetanic spasms. It is more powerful than the poison obtained from the upas-tree, with which it must not be confounded.

Chetvert (chet'vėrt), n. [After a Russian general of that name.] A Russian grain measure, equal to 0·7218 of an imperial quarter, or 5·77 bushels.

Chrismation (kriz-mā'shon), n. The act of applying the chrism or consecrated oil in baptism by the priest or in confirmation by the bishop. In the latter ceremony it is usually styled Unction.

Chrismatory (kriz'ma-to-ri), n. [L. L. chrismatorium.] In the Roman Cath. and Greek Churches, a receptacle for the chrism or holy oil used in the services of the church. In the Roman Catholic Church the chrismatory usually comprises three separate vessels—one, containing the oil for use in baptism; a second, the oil used in confirmation; and a third, that used in anointing the sick.

Chrismatory.

Chrisom, Chrisome (kris'um), n. [See CHRISM.] 1. (a) A baptismal cloth anointed with chrism laid on a child's face at baptism. (b) The white consecrated vesture put about a child when christened in token of innocence, and with which in former times it was shrouded if it died within the month. Hence—2. A chrisom child.—Chrisom child, (a) a newly baptized infant. (b) A child that dies within a month after christening.

Every morning creeps out of a dark cloud, leaving behind it an ignorance and silence deep as midnight, and undiscerned as are the phantasms that make a chrisome child to smile. Jer. Taylor.

Christ (krist), n. [L. Christus, Gr. Christos, lit. anointed, from chriō, to anoint.] THE ANOINTED: an appellation given to the Saviour of the world, and synonymous with the Hebrew MESSIAH. It was a custom of antiquity to consecrate persons to the sacerdotal and regal offices by anointing them with oil.

Christadelphian, Christodelphian (kris-ta-del'fi-an, kris-to-del'fi-an), n. [Gr. Christos, Christ, and adelphos, a brother.] Lit. a brother of Christ; one of a sect of Christians. Called also Thomasites. See THOMASITE.

Christ-cross,† Crist-cross† (kris'kros), n. 1. Mark of the cross cut, printed, or stamped on any object. It was sometimes placed on a dial for the figure XII., that is, as the sign of 12 o'clock.—2. The beginning and end; the Alpha and Omega: probably from the sign of the cross being prefixed and appended to serious literary undertakings, inscriptions on sepulchral monuments, &c.

Christ's cross is the crist-cross of all our happiness. Quarles.

Christcross-row (kris'kros-rō), n. An old term for the alphabet, probably from the cross anciently set before it, or from a superstitious custom of writing it in the form of a cross by way of charm. 'Truths to be learned before ever a letter in the Christian's Christcross-row.' Whitlock.

Christen (kris'n), v.t. [A. Sax. cristnian, to christen, from Cristen, a Christian, from Crist, Christ. See CHRIST.] 1. To initiate into the visible church of Christ by the application of water; to name and baptize; to baptize: applied to persons. Hence—2. To name; to denominate: applied to things. 'Christen the thing what you will.' Bp. Burnet.—3.† To christianize.

I am most certain this is the first example in England since it was first christened. Jer. Taylor.

Christen (kris'n), v.i. 1. To perform the rite of baptism; as, he christens and dispenses the eucharist.—2. To get the sacrament of baptism performed for one's children.

As the parishioners had these chapels at first for their own ease, so they may resort to the mother-church, bury, christen, marry, and have all other services and advantages from them. Ayliffe.

Christendom (kris'n-dum), n. [A. Sax. cristendom—cristen, Christian, and term. -dom.] 1.† The profession of faith in Christ by baptism; hence, adoption of faith in Christ; personal Christianity.

This . . . cannot be denied . . . by any man that would not have his christendom suspected. Jer. Taylor.

2. The territories, countries, or regions chiefly inhabited by Christians or those who profess to believe in the Christian religion.—3. The whole body of Christians. 4.† The name received at baptism; hence, any name or epithet.

With a world
Of pretty, fond, adoptious christendoms. Shak.

Christian (kris'tyan), n. [L. christianus, from Christus, Christ. See CHRIST.] 1. One who believes, professes to believe, or who is assumed to believe, in the religion of Christ; especially, one who believes in the truth of the Christian religion and studies to follow the example and obey the precepts of Christ; a believer in Christ who is characterized by real piety.—2. In the most general sense, one born in a Christian country or of Christian parents.

Christian (kris'tyan), a. Pertaining to Christ or to Christianity. See the noun.—Christian name, the name given or announced at baptism, as distinguished from the family name.—Christian era or period, the period from the birth of Christ to the present time.

Christian † (kris'tyan), v.t. To baptize. Fulke.

Christian, Christian d'Or (kris'tyan, kris'tyan dor), n. An old Danish gold coin of the value of from 16*s.* to 16*s.* 4*d.* sterling.

Christiana (kris-ti-ä'na), n. An old Swedish silver coin worth 7*d.* sterling.

Christianism † (kris'tyan-izm), n. [Gr. christianismos. See CHRIST.] 1. The Christian religion. Milton.—2. The nations professing Christianity. Johnson.

Christianite (kris'tyan-īt), n. [After Prince Christian Frederick of Denmark.] A mineral, a product of Mount Vesuvius. Its primitive form is that of an oblique rectangular prism; its colours brown, yellow, or reddish.

Christianity (kris-ti-an'i-ti), n. 1. The religion of Christians, or the system of doctrines and precepts taught by Christ and recorded by the evangelists and apostles.—2. Adherence to the Christian faith; conformity to the laws and precepts of the Christian religion.

Christianity does not so much give us new affections or faculties as a new direction to those we already have. Hannah More.

Christianization (kris'tyan-iz-ā"shon), n. The act or process of converting to Christianity. 'The christianization . . . of the clergy and people of Russia.' Dean Stanley.

Christianize (kris'tyan-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. christianized; ppr. christianizing. 1. To make Christian; to convert to Christianity; as, to christianize pagans.—2. To imbue with Christian principles. 'Christianized philosophers.' Is. Taylor.

Christianlike (kris'tyan-līk), a. Becoming a Christian. Shak.

Christianly (kris'tyan-li), adv. In a Christian manner; in a manner becoming the principles of the Christian religion or the profession of that religion. 'Every man christianly instructed.' Milton.

Christianly (kris'tyan-li), a. Christianlike; becoming a Christian. [Rare.]

Father he hight and he was in the parish; a christianly plainness Clothed from his head to his feet the old man of seventy winters. Longfellow.

Christian-name (kris'tyan-nām), v.t. To address by the Christian name. 'The girls Christian-named each other.' Thackeray.

Christianness † (kris'tyan-nes), n. 1. Profession of Christianity.—2. The quality of being in consonance with the doctrines of Christianity.

It is very unreasonable to judge the christianness of an action by the law of natural reason. Hammond.

Christianography † (kris-tyan-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. christianos, a Christian, and graphē, description.] A description of Christian nations. Eph. Pagit.

Christless (krīst'les), a. Having no interest in Christ; without the spirit of Christ. Tennyson.

Christmas (kris'mas), n. [Christ, and mass, A. Sax. mæssa, a holy day or feast.] 1. The festival of the Christian church observed annually on the 25th day of December, in memory of the birth of Christ, and celebrated by a particular church service. The festival includes twelve days.—2. Christmas-day.

Christmas-box (kris'mas-boks), n. A box in which presents are deposited at Christmas; hence, a Christmas gift.

Christmas-day (kris'mas-dā), n. The 25th day of December, when Christmas is celebrated.

Christmas-eve (kris'mas-ēv), n. The evening of the day before Christmas.

Christmas-flower (kris'mas-flou-ėr), n. Same as Christmas-rose.

Christmasing † (kris'mas-ing), n. The act of celebrating Christmas.

Christmas-log (kris'mas-log), n. A large log of wood, which in old times formed the basis of the fire at Christmas.

Christmas-pie (kris'mas-pī), n. A pie made at Christmas. Spectator.

Christmas-rose (kris'mas-rōz), n. A plant, Helleborus niger, so called from its open rose-like flower, which blossoms during the winter months. See HELLEBORUS.

Christmas-rose (Helleborus niger).

Christmas-tide, Christmas-time (kris'mas-tīd, kris'mas-tīm), n. The season of Christmas.

Christmas-tree (kris'mas-trē), n. A small evergreen tree or large branch with offshoots set up in a family, &c., at Christmas, from which are hung presents, generally with the names of the recipients inscribed on them.

Christodelphian, n. See CHRISTADELPHIAN.

Christology (kris-tol'o-ji), n. [Gr. Christos, Christ, and logos, a discourse.] A discourse or treatise concerning Christ; that branch of divinity that deals directly with Christ. 'That part of divinity which I make bold to call Christology.' Th. Jackson.

Christolyte (kris'tō-līt), n. [Gr. Christos, Christ, and lyō, to loose.] One of a sect of Christians of the sixth century who held that, when Christ descended into hell, he left both his body and soul there, and rose with his divine nature alone.

Christ's-thorn (krīsts'thorn), n. The Paliurus aculeatus, a deciduous shrub, a native of Palestine and the south of Europe: so named from a belief that it supplied the crown of thorns for Christ. See PALIURUS.

Christ-tide† (kris'tīd), n. [Christ, and tide, in sense of season, as in Whitsun-tide.] Christmas. B. Jonson.

Chromascope (krō'ma-skōp), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and skopeō, to see, to look at.] An instrument for showing the optical effects of colour.

Chromate (krō'māt), n. [See CHROMIUM.] A salt of chromic acid.—Chromate of iron, a mineral substance which affords one of the most beautiful and durable pigments known.—The chromate and bichromate of potassium are much used in calico-printing, and the chromates of lead are employed as yellow and red dyes and paints.

Chromatic (krō-mat'ik), a. [Gr. chrōmatikos, from chrōma, colour, from chrōzō, to colour. The term is applied to music from the fact that the intermediate tones were formerly written in different colours.] 1. Relating to colour.—Chromatic printing, printing from types or blocks covered with various colours of ink.—Chromatic type, type made in parts, which are inked of various colours and separately impressed, so as to unite into a variegated whole.—2. In music, including notes not belonging to the diatonic scale.—Chromatic chord, a chord which contains a note or notes foreign to diatonic progression.—Chromatic harmony, harmony consisting of chromatic chords.—Chromatic scale, a scale made up of thirteen successive semitones, that is, the eight diatonic tones and the five intermediate tones.

Chromatic (krō-mat'ik), n. [See above.] A kind of music that proceeds by several consecutive semitones or semitonic intervals; or it denotes accidental semitones.

Chromatical† (krō-mat'ik-al), a. Same as Chromatic.

Among sundry kinds of music, that which is called chromatical delyghteth, enlargeth and joyeth the heart. Holland.

Chromatically (krō-mat'ik-al-li), adv. In a chromatic manner.

Chromatics (krō-mat'iks), n. The science of colours; that part of optics which treats of the properties of the colours of light and of natural bodies.

Chromatography (krō-ma-tog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. chrōma, chrōmatos, colour, and graphē, description.] A treatise on colours.

Chromatology (krō-ma-tol'o-ji), n. [Gr. chrōma, chromatos, colour, and logos, discourse.] The doctrine of or a treatise on colours.

Chromatometer (krō-ma-tom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. chrōma, chrōmatos, colour, and metron, a measure.] A scale for measuring colours.

And thus . . . the prismatic spectrum of sunlight became, for certain purposes, an exact chromatometer. Whewell.

Chromatophore (krō-mat'ō-fōr), n. [Gr. chrōma, chrōmatos, colour, and pherein, to bear.] One of the pigment cells in animals, well seen in the chameleons and cuttlefishes. The cells being mobile, and containing pigment-granules of different colours, enable the animals to change their colours rapidly, under irritation or excitement. H. A. Nicholson.

Chromatrope, Chromotrope (krō'ma-trōp, krō'mō-trōp), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and trepō, to turn.] An arrangement in a magic lantern similar in its effect to the kaleidoscope. The pictures are produced by brilliant designs being painted on two circular glasses and the glasses being made to rotate in opposite directions. E. H. Knight.

Chromatype, Chromotype (krō'ma-tīp, krō'mō-tīp), n. [From Gr. chrōma, colour, and E. type.] In photog. (a) a process for obtaining coloured photographic pictures by the employment of paper sensitized by some of the salts of chromium. (b) A picture produced by this process.

Chrome (krōm), n. Same as Chromium.

Chrome-alum (krōm'al-um), n. A crystallizable double salt, formed of the sulphates of chromium and potassium.

Chrome-colour (krōm'kul-ėr), n. Properly, a colour prepared from some of the salts of chromium, but generally applied to any colour which, when dry, is of a soft powdery consistence, and may be mixed with oil without grinding.

Chrome-green (krōm'grēn), n. A beautiful dark-green pigment prepared from the oxide of chromium.

Chrome-iron (krōm'ī-ėrn), n. Chromate of iron. See under CHROMATE.

Chrome-orange (krōm'or-anj), n. A bright yellow pigment, consisting of chromate of lead.

Chrome-red (krōm'red), n. A beautiful red pigment prepared from red-lead. It is a basic chromate of lead.

Chrome-yellow (krōm'yel-lō), n. A name given to chromate of lead, from its colour. It is a brilliant yellow pigment much used in the arts.

Chromic (krōm'ik), a. Pertaining to chrome or chromium, or obtained from it; as, chromic acid. This acid (Cr_2O_3, more properly termed chromic oxide) destroys the colour of indigo and of most vegetable and animal colouring matters, a property advantageously employed in calico-printing. It forms coloured salts with alkaline bases, the most important of which is chromate of lead, which is of a rich yellow colour, and is largely employed in the arts of painting and dyeing.

Chromidæ, Chromides (krom'i-dē, krom'i-dēz), n. pl. [Gr. chromis, a kind of sea-fish, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of teleostean fishes, generally inhabiting the fresh waters of hot climates, allied to the Labridæ or true wrasses. Some are good eating, and one Nile species, with cycloid instead of, as in the others, ctenoid scales, is reckoned the best in the river.

Chromion (krō'mi-on), n. Same as Chromium.

Chromism (krōm'izm), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] In bot. an unnatural colouring of plants or leaves.

Chromite (krōm'īt), n. A mineral containing chromium.

Chromium (krō'mi-um), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] Sym. Cr. At. wt. 52·4. A metal which forms very hard steel-gray masses; it never occurs native, but may be obtained by reducing the oxide. In its highest degree of oxidation it forms a salt of a ruby-red colour. It takes its name from the various and beautiful colours which its oxide and acid communicate to minerals into whose composition they enter. Chromium is employed to give a fine deep green to the enamel of porcelain, to glass, &c. The oxide of chromium is of a bright grass-green or pale yellow colour. Also called Chrome and sometimes Chromion.

Chromo (krō'mō), n. A contraction for Chromo-lithograph.

Chromochre, Chrome-stone (krōm'ō-kėr, krōm'stōn), n. A mineral containing the oxides of chrome and of iron, silica, and alumina. It occurs in loose earthy masses, of a fine yellowish green, generally so mixed up with the rock in which it occurs as to be separable only by chemical means.

Chromogen (krō'mō-jen), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and gennaō, to produce.] Same as Chromule.

Chromogenic (krō-mō-jen'ik), a. Pertaining to chromogen.

Chromograph (krō'mō-graf), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and graphō, to write.] A coloured engraving.

Chromolith (krō'mō-lith), n. A short form of Chromo-lithograph.

Chromo-lithograph (krō-mō-lith'o-graf), n. A picture obtained by means of chromo-lithography.

Chromo-lithographer (krō-mō-li-thog'raf-ėr), n. One who practises chromo-lithography.

Chromo-lithographic (krō-mō-lith'o-graf''ik), a. Pertaining to chromo-lithography.

Chromo-lithography (krō''mō-li-thog'ra-fi), n. A method of producing a coloured or tinted lithographic picture, by using various stones having different portions of the picture drawn upon them with inks of various colours and so arranged as to blend into a complete picture. Sometimes so many as twenty different colours are employed. In printing the lighter shades are printed off first and the darkest last.

Chromosphere (krō'mō-sfēr), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and sphaira, a sphere.] The name given to the gaseous envelope supposed to exist round the body of the sun, through which the light of the photosphere passes. J. N. Lockyer. — Stellar chromosphere, the gaseous envelope supposed to exist round the body of a star.

Chromospheric (krō-mō-sfer'ik), a. Pertaining or relating to a chromosphere; as, the chromospheric spectrum.

Chromotrope, n. See CHROMATROPE.

Chromotype, n. See CHROMATYPE.

Chromule (krō'mūl), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] The colouring matter of plants other than green. Called also Chromogen.

Chronic (kron'ik), a. [Gr. chronikos, from chronos, time, duration.] 1. Pertaining to time; having reference to time.—2. Continuing a long time, as a disease. A chronic disease is one which is inveterate or of long continuance, in distinction from an acute disease, which speedily terminates.

Chronical† (kron'ik-al), a. Same as Chronic, 1.

> Partly on a chronical and partly on a topical method. F. A. Alexander.

Chronicle (kron'i-kl), n. [Fr. chronique, a chronicle. See CHRONIC.] 1. A historical account of facts or events disposed in the order of time; a history, more especially one of a simple, unpretentious character. 'Irish chronicles which are most fabulous and forged.' Spenser.—2. That which contains, conveys, or suggests history.

> Europe . . . her very ruins tell the history of times gone by, and every mouldering stone is a chronicle. Irving.

3. pl. The title of two books of the Old Testament, consisting mainly of the annals of the kingdom of Judah. The authorship is commonly ascribed to Ezra. — History, Chronicle, Annals. See under HISTORY.

Chronicle (kron'i-kl), v.t. pret. & pp. chronicled; ppr. chronicling. To record in history or chronicle; to record; to register. 'To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.' Shak.

Chronicler (kron'i-klėr), n. A writer of a chronicle; a recorder of events in the order of time.

> After my death I wish no other herald, . . .
> But such an honest chronicler as Griffith. Shak.

Chroniclist (kron'i-klist), n. A chronicler. Shelton.

Chronicon (kron'i-kon), n. Same as Chronicle.

Chronique† (kron'ik), n. A chronicle. L. Addison.

Chronogram (kron'ō-gram), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and gramma, a letter or writing, from graphō, to write.] An inscription in which a certain date or epoch is expressed by numeral letters, as in the motto of a medal struck by Gustavus Adolphus in 1632.

> ChrIstVs DVX; ergo trIVMphVs.

Chronogrammatic, Chronogrammatical (kron'ō-gram-mat''ik, kron'ō-gram-mat''ik-al), a. Belonging to a chronogram; containing a chronogram. 'A chronogrammatical verse.' Howell.

Chronogrammatically (kron'ō-gram-mat''ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of a chronogram. Wood.

Chronogrammatist (kron-ō-gram'mat-ist), n. A writer of chronograms. Addison.

Chronograph (kron'ō-graf), n. 1. A chronogram.—2. The name given to various devices for measuring and registering very minute portions of time with extreme precision. Benson's chronograph is, in principle, a lever watch with a double seconds hand, the one superimposed on the other. The outer end of the lowermost hand has a small cup filled with a black viscid fluid, with a minute hole at the bottom, while the corresponding end of the uppermost is bent down so as just to reach the hole. At the starting (say) of a horse-race, the observer pulls a string, whereupon the bent end of the upper hand passes through the hole and makes a black mark on the dial, instantly rebounding. Again, as each horse passes the winning post, the string is redrawn and a dot made, and thus the time occupied by each horse is noted. This chronograph registers to one-tenth of a second. Strange's chronograph is connected with the pendulum of an astronomical clock, which makes a mark on a sheet of paper at the beginning and end of each swing. By touching a spring on the appearance (say) of a particular star on the field of a telescope, an additional dot is made intermediate between the two extreme ones, and by measuring the distance of this from either of these extremes the exact time can be ascertained to one-hundredth of a second. Schultze's chronograph, in which electricity is applied, is yet far more precise, registering time to the five-hundred-thousandth part of a second. By it the initial velocity of a cannon-bullet may be ascertained. This name has also been given to the class of instruments described under Chronoscope.

Chronographer (kro-nog'raf-ėr), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and graphō, to describe.] One who writes concerning time or the events of time; a chronologer. 'Our monkish and succeeding chronographers.' Selden.

Chronography (kro-nog'ra-fi), n. The description or investigation of past events; chronology. [Rare.]

Chronologer (kro-nol'o-jėr), n. Same as Chronologist.

Chronologic, Chronological (kron-o-loj'ik, kron-o-loj'ik-al), a. Relating to chronology; containing an account of events in the order of time; according to the order of time; as, a chronologic table; a chronological narrative.

Chronologically (kron-o-loj'ik-al-li), adv. In a chronological manner; in a manner according with the order of time, the series of events, or rules of chronology.

Chronologist (kro-nol'o-jist), n. One versed in chronology; a person who investigates the dates of past events and transactions.

Chronology (kro-nol'o-ji), n. [Gr. chronologia — chronos, time, and logos, discourse or doctrine.] The science of time: (a) the method of measuring or computing time by regular divisions or periods, according to the revolutions of the sun or moon: this is what is termed astronomical or mathematical chronology. (b) The science of ascertaining the true periods or years when past events or transactions took place, and arranging them in their proper order according to their dates: this is what is called historical chronology, and when the word chronology is used without a qualifying term it has this signification.

Chronometer (kro-nom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and metron, measure.] 1. Any instrument that measures time or that divides time into equal portions, or that is used for that purpose, as a clock, watch, or dial. Specifically, this term is applied to those time-keepers which are used for determining the longitude at sea, or for any other purpose where an accurate measure of time is required, with great portability in the instrument. The chronometer differs from the ordinary watch in the principle of its escapement, which is so constructed that the balance is free from the wheels during the greater part of its vibration, and also in being fitted with a 'compensation adjustment,' calculated to prevent the expansion and contraction of the metal by the action of heat and cold from affecting its movements. Marine chronometers generally beat half seconds, and are hung in gimbals in boxes 6 or 8 inches square. The pocket chronometer does not differ in appearance from a watch except that it is somewhat larger. In some cases these beat four-tenth seconds.—To rate a chronometer is to ascertain the exact rate of its gain or loss as compared with true time, for the purpose of making the proper allowance in computations dependent thereon.—2. In music, a name sometimes given to what is properly called a metronome (which see).

Chronometric, Chronometrical (kron-o-met'rik, kron-o-met'rik-al), a. Pertaining to a chronometer; measured by a chronometer. — Chronometrical governor, an improved regulator for rendering the mean velocity of an engine uniform.

Chronometry (kro-nom'et-ri), n. The art of measuring time; the measuring of time by periods or divisions.

Chronoscope (kron'o-skōp), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and skopeō, to observe.] An instrument for measuring the duration of extremely short-lived phenomena; more especially, the name given to instruments of various forms for measuring the velocity of projectiles. The most general arrangement consists of a series of screens through which a bullet is made to pass; the rupture of each screen breaking for a moment the continuity of an electric current, setting in action an electro-magnetic machine, and making a permanent mark or record.

Chrysalid (kris'a-lid), n. A chrysalis.

Chrysalis (kris'a-lis), n. The pl. is properly Chrysalides (kri-sal'i-dēz). [Gr. chrysallis, a grub, from chrysos, gold, from its golden colour.] A form which butterflies, moths, and most other insects assume when they change from the state of larva or caterpillar and before they arrive at their winged or perfect state. In the chrysalis form the animal is in a state of rest or insensibility, and exists without nutriment, the length of time varying with the species and season. During this period an elaboration is going on in the interior of the chrysalis, giving to the organs of the future animal their proper development before it breaks its envelope.

Chimonanthus (kī-mō-nan'thus), n. [Gr. cheimōn, winter, and anthos, a flower, in allusion to the time of their flowering.] A genus of branching shrubs, nat. order Calycanthaceæ, consisting of a single species, C. fragrans, a native of Japan, and popularly called Japan all-spice. It was introduced into our gardens in 1766, and is a great favourite because of its early sweet-scented flowers. It is generally trained against walls.

Chimpanzee, Chimpansee (chim-pan'zē or chim'pan-zē), n. [The native Guinea name.] A large West African ape (Troglodytes niger) belonging to the anthropoid or man-like monkeys, with dark-brown hair approaching black, arms reaching only to the knee, very large ears, and, like the orang, having the hair on its forearm turned backwards, but differing from it in having an additional dorsal vertebra and a thirteenth pair of ribs. In its organization and form it presents a considerable resemblance to man. The structure of its lower extremities enables it to walk erect better than most of the apes, although its habits are in reality arboreal. It feeds on fruits and nuts, lives in small societies, and constructs a sort of nest amongst the branches. The height of a full-grown chimpanzee is about 4 feet. This Chisley (chiz'li), a. [A. Sax. ceosel, ceosl, gravel, sand; comp. chessom.] Having a sandy and clayey character; containing a large admixture of gravel and small pebbles: said of soils.

Chissels, Chisels (chis'elz), n. The coarser part of bran or flour after the finer part is separated.

Chit (chit), n. [A. Sax. cith, a shoot or twig.] 1. A shoot or sprout; the first shooting or germination of a seed or plant. 'The chit or sprit at the root end.' Mortimer. Hence —2. A child or babe. 'A squealing chit.' Tatler. [Colloq.]—3.† A pimple; a wart.—4. An instrument for cleaving laths.

Chit† (chit), v.i. To sprout; to shoot, as a seed or plant.

> I have known barley chit in seven hours after being thrown forth. Mortimer.

Chit, Chitty (chit, chit'ti), n. [A corruption of the Hindu term chit hee, a letter.] A note or letter; a written message. Also called Chittah.

> This evening comes a native trooper into camp with a chitty for 'Russell Sahib.' W. H. Russell.

Chit† (chit), for Chideth. Chaucer.

Chit-chat (chit'chat), n. [A reduplication of chat. See CHAT.] Prattle; familiar or trifling talk.

> Nothing can be more unlike than the inflated finical rhapsodies of Shaftesbury and the plain, natural chit-chat of Temple. Lamb.

Chitin, Chitine (kī'tin), n. [Fr. chitōn, a tunic.] The name given by Odier to the organic substance which forms the elytra and integuments of insects and the carapaces of crustacea, and which may be obtained by exhausting the wing-cases of cockchafers with water, alcohol, ether, acetic acid, and boiling alkalies. The residue retains the form of the wing-cases. It is solid, transparent, and of horny aspect. Its composition is regarded as being $C_6H_{15}NO_6$.

Chitinous (kī'tin-us), a. Consisting of, or having the nature of chitin.

Chiton (kī'ton), n. [Gr. chitōn.] A tunic; the under garment worn by the ancient Greeks. The Doric chiton, worn by men, was short and of wool; the Ionic was of linen, worn long, with short, wide sleeves. Dr. W. Smith.

Chiton (kī'ton), n. [Gr. chitōn, a tunic, a cuirass, a coat of mail, the name being given from the shell.] A genus of molluscs forming the type of the family Chitonidæ; a member of this family.

Chitonidæ (kī-ton'i-dē), n. pl. A natural family of gasteropods, affording the only instance known of a molluscan shell formed of many successive portions, often in contact and overlapping each other, but never truly articulated. The shell in the typical genus Chiton is composed of eight pieces; the animal adhering to rocks or stones after the fashion of the limpet. The species are numerous, and there are few rocky shores without some of them. Some of the species are fossil in carboniferous rocks.

Chittah (chit'tä), n. See CHIT, CHITTY.

Chitter (chit'tèr), v.i. [Closely allied to chatter; comp. G. zitteren, to tremble.] 1. To shiver; to shake, as with cold. [Obsolete and provincial.]—2.† To chirp.

> I chitter, chirp, and syng. Kendall.

Chitterling (chit'tèr-ling), n. [Perhaps allied to Sc. kite, Goth. quithus, the belly; or ch may be for sh, the word being a dim. derived from the verb that means to evacuate the bowels.] 1. In cookery, part of the small intestines, as of swine, fried for food: generally used in the plural. 'Which was but souse to chitterlings.' Hudibras.—2.† The frill to the breast of a shirt.

> Of an Italian waist, we make an English petycoate; of a French ruffe, an English chytterling. Gascoigne.

Chitty (chit'ti), a. [See CHIT, a sprout.] 1. Full of chits or sprouts.—2.† Childish; like a babe.—3.† Afflicted with warts or pimples.

Chitty-face,† Chitty-faced† (chit'ti-fās, chit'ti-fāst), a. [From chitty (see above), and face.] 1. Meagre-faced; baby-faced. 'The peaking, chitty-face page.' Massinger. 2. Pimply-faced.

Chivache, Chivachie, n. See CHEVACHIE.

Chivalric (shiv'al-rik), a. Partaking of the character of chivalry; chivalrous.

Chivalrous (shiv'al-rus), a. [See CHIVALRY.] Pertaining to chivalry or knight-errantry; warlike; bold; gallant. 'Chivalrous emprise.' Spenser.

> A fourth (in Milton's catalogue of names) brings before us the splendid phantoms of chivalrous romance, the trophied lists, the embroidered housings, the quaint devices, the haunted forests, the enchanted gardens, the achievements of enamoured knights, and the smiles of rescued princesses. Macaulay.

Chivalrously (shiv'al-rus-li), adv. In a chivalrous manner or spirit.

Chivalrousness (shiv'al-rus-nes), n. The quality of being chivalrous; gallantry; nobility of spirit; magnanimity; gallant self-sacrifice on behalf of the weak.

Chivalry (shiv'al-ri), n. [Fr. chevalerie, from chevalier, a knight or horseman, from cheval, a horse. See CAVALRY.] 1. Knighthood; the system to which knighthood with all its laws and usages belonged. 'Degrees and orders of chivalry.' Bacon.—2. That which pertains to knighthood; the qualifications of a knight, as courtesy, valour, and dexterity in arms.

> The glory of our Troy this day doth lie
> On his fair worth and single chivalry. Shak.

3.† An adventure or exploit, as of a knight. 'Acts more dangerous, but less famous, because they were but private chivalries.' Sir P. Sidney.—4. A body or order of knights; knights or warriors collectively; any body of illustrious warriors, especially cavalry.

> The Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrow
> Busiris and his Memphian chivalry. Milton.
> Wave, Munich, all thy banners wave,
> And charge with all thy chivalry. Campbell.

5. In English law, a tenure of lands by knight's service; that is, by the condition of performing service on horseback, or of performing some noble or military service to his lord. See KNIGHT-SERVICE and TENURE.—Court of Chivalry, a court established by Edward III., of which the Lord High Constable and the Earl-marshal of England were joint judges. When both judges were present it took cognizance of criminal cases, generally in a summary manner; when held before the earl-marshal alone it was merely a court of honour. It is now in abeyance, except as represented in the Heralds' College by the earl-marshal's court.

Chive† (chīv), n. [L.G. scheve, the shives or fragments of stalk, as of hemp or flax, that fall off in dressing; Icel. skēfa, to cleave.] In bot. the thread or filament which supports the anther of a flower. Ray.

Chive (chīv), n. See CIVE.

Chive-garlic (chīv'gär-lik), n. Same as Cive.

Chiver (chiv'ėr), v.i. To shiver. [Old English and Scotch.]

Chivey, Chivvy (chiv'i), v.t. [See extract.] To chase round or hunt about; to throw or pitch about. [Slang.]

> Chivvy is a common English word, meaning to goad, drive, vex, hunt, or throw as it were here and there. It is purely Gipsy. Chiv in Romnany means anything sharp-pointed, as a dagger or goad, or knife. The old Gipsy word chiv, among its numerous meanings, has exactly that of casting, throwing, pitching, and driving. C. G. Leland.

Chivey (chiv'i), n. A halloo; a shout; a cheer. [Slang.]

Chlamydate (klam'id-āt), a. [Gr. chlamys, chlamydos, a mantle.] In zool. possessing a mantle; as, chlamydate Branchiogasteropoda.

Chlamydeous (kla-mid'ē-us), a. In bot. pertaining to the floral envelope of a plant.

Chlamydosaurus (klam'i-dō-sa"rus), n. [Gr. chlamys, chlamydos, a cloak, and sauros, a lizard.] A genus of Australian lizards. The C. Kingii, known as the frilled lizard, has a curious crenated membrane-like ruff or tippet round its neck, covering its shoulders, which lies back in plaits upon the body when the animal is tranquil, but which elevates itself when it is irritated or frightened. Its head is large in proportion to its body. A full-grown specimen is about 3 feet in length.

Chlamyphore (klam'i-fōr), n. See CHLAMYPHORUS.

Chlamyphorus, Chlamydophorus (klamif'o-rus, klam-i-dof'o-rus), n. [Gr. chlamys, chlamydos, a cloak, and phērō, to bear.] A genus of quadrupeds of the order Edentata. The C. truncatus, or pichiciago, resembles the mole in its habits; it is about 5 inches long, and its back is covered over with a coat of mail, consisting of twenty-four rows of tough leathery plates. It is a native of Chili, and nearly allied to the armadillo.

Chlamys (klam'is), n. [L. and Gr.] 1. A light and freely-flowing scarf or plaid worn by the ancients as an outer garment. It was oblong in shape, generally about twice as long as it was broad. A common mode of wearing it was to pass one of its shorter sides round the neck and fasten it by means of a brooch, letting it hang down over the back or over the shoulder.—2. A purple cope; one of the pontifical vestments.—3. In bot. the floral envelope of a plant.

Chloasma (klō-az'ma), n. [Gr. chloazō, to be green.] In pathol. lit. greenness; a name for a cutaneous affection characterized by patches of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, the pityriasis versicolor. It is removable by the use of sulphur.

Chloe (klō'ē), n. The name of the heroine of Longus' pastoral romance Daphnis and Chloe, and of a shepherdess in Sydney's Arcadia; hence applied in literature to a female lover.

> To turn their attention away while Strephon and Chloe were billing and cooing. Thackeray.

Chlora (klō'ra), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow.] A small genus of gentianaceous plants, consisting of erect glaucous herbs. One species (C. perfoliata) is found in the chalky pastures of England. Its stem is from 6 to 18 inches high, and terminates in a number of flower-stalks, each bearing a single largish delicate yellow flower. The whole plant is very bitter, and may be employed as a tonic; it is used also as a yellow dye. Its popular name is yellow-wort or yellow centaury.

Chloracetate (klōr-as'ē-tāt), n. A salt of chloracetic acid.

Chloracetic Acid (klōr-a-set'ik as'id), n. ($C_2H_3ClO_2$.) An acid produced by the substitution of chlorine for part of the hydrogen in acetic acid. It combines with bases, forming chloracetates.

Chloral (klō'ral), n. [From chlor, the first part of chlorine, and al, the first syllable of alcohol.] (C_2HCl_3O.) A liquid first prepared by Liebig from chlorine and alcohol, afterwards by Städeler by the action of chlorine on starch. The hydrate of chloral, as now prepared ($C_2HCl_3O.H_2O$), is a white crystalline substance, which, in contact with alkalies, separates into chloroform and formic acid. Hence, when it comes into contact with living blood, the alkaline reaction of that fluid effects its decomposition, and a formation of chloroform is the result. When taken into the mouth or injected into the blood the chloroform set free is given up to the blood little by little. Hence the action of chloral differs from that of pure chloroform in being slow, gentle, and prolonged. Chloral kills by paralyzing the action of the heart. It is a hypnotic as well as an anæsthetic, and is frequently substituted for morphia. Chloral does not combine with blood out of the body. Some authorities ascribe its effects to the formic acid developed in its transformation.

Chloranil, Chloranile (klōr'a-nil), n. [From chlorine and aniline.] ($C_6Cl_4O_2$.) A compound produced by the action of chlorine on aniline, phenol, salicin, and other allied bodies. It forms pale yellow pearly scales. By dissolving it in caustic potash chloranilate of potassium is formed.

Chloranthaceæ (klō-ran-thā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and anthos, a flower.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens, allied to the peppers, and, like them, having an aromatic fragrant odour; they are trees, shrubs, or herbs with opposite leaves, connected by sheathing stipules. There are three known genera, and fifteen species, all natives of the warm regions of India and America. Chloranthus officinalis is reckoned a stimulant and tonic of the highest order.

Chloranthus (klō-ran'thus), n. See CHLORANTHACEÆ.

Chlorate (klō'rāt), n. [See CHLORINE.] A salt of chloric acid. The chlorates are very analogous to the nitrates. They are decomposed by a red heat, nearly all of them being converted into metallic chlorides, with evolution of pure oxygen. They deflagrate with inflammable substances with such facility that an explosion is produced by slight causes. The chlorates of sodium and potassium are used in medicine.

Chloretic (klō'ret-ik), n. Same as Chloritic.

Chloric (klō'rik), a. Pertaining to or containing chlorine; specifically, containing chlorine in smaller proportion than chlorous compounds.—Chloric acid, a colourless syrupy liquid ($HClO_3$), having a very acid reaction, produced by decomposing barium chlorate by means of sulphuric acid.—Perchloric acid, an extremely explosive acid ($HClO_4$), containing one atom of oxygen more than chloric acid. It is produced by distilling perchlorate of potassium with sulphuric acid.—Chloric ether, a volatile liquid (C_2H_5Cl) obtained by passing hydrochloric acid gas into alcohol to saturation and distilling the product. It is also termed Hydrochloric Ether.

Chloridate, Chloridize (klō'rid-āt, klō'rid-īz), v.t. In photog. to cover a plate with a chloride, specifically, with chloride of silver, for the purpose of rendering it sensitive to the actinic rays of the sun.

Chloride (klō'rīd), n. [See CHLORINE.] A compound of chlorine with another element.

Chlorimeter, Chlorimetry (klō-rim'et-ėr, klō-rim'e-tri), n. Same as Chlorometer, Chlorometry.

Chlorinated (klō'rin-āt-ed), a. In chem. containing one or more equivalents of chlorine.

Chlorination (klō-ri-nā'shon), n. In mining, a process for the extraction of gold by exposure of the auriferous material to chlorine gas. E. H. Knight.

Chlorine (klō'rīn or klō'rin), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, from its colour.] Sym. Cl. At. wt. 35·5. The name given to an elementary gaseous substance contained in common salt, from which it is liberated by the action of sulphuric acid and manganese dioxide. Chlorine has a greenish-yellow colour, a peculiar smell, and irritates the nostrils most violently when inhaled, as also the windpipe and lungs. It exercises a corrosive action upon organic tissues. It is not combustible, though it supports the combustion of many bodies, and, indeed, spontaneously burns several. In combination with other elements it forms chlorides, which act most important parts in many manufacturing processes. This gas may be liquefied by cold and pressure. Chlorine is one of the most powerful bleaching agents, this property belonging to it through its strong affinity for hydrogen. Hence in the manufacture of bleaching-powder (chloride of lime) it is used in immense quantities. When applied to moistened coloured fabrics it acts by decomposing the moisture present, the oxygen of which then destroys the colouring matter of the cloth, &c. It is a valuable disinfectant, where it can be conveniently applied, as in the form of chloride of lime.

Chloriodic (klō'ri-od-ik), a. Compounded of chlorine and iodine.

Chloriodine (klō-rī'od-in), n. A compound of chlorine and iodine.

Chlorite (klō'rīt), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow.] 1. A mineral of a grass-green colour, opaque, usually friable or easily pulverized, composed of little spangles, scales, prisms, or shining small grains, and consisting of silica, alumina, magnesia, and protoxide of iron. It is closely allied in character to mica and talc. There are four sub-species—chlorite earth, common chlorite, chlorite slate, and foliated chlorite. 2. In chem. a salt of chlorous acid. The chlorites are remarkable for their strong bleaching and oxidizing properties.

Chloritic (klō-rit'ik), a. Pertaining to or containing chlorite; as, chloritic sand.

Chloro- (klō'rō). [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow.] A term used in the composition of botanical and other scientific words formed from the Greek, to indicate a clear lively green colour without any mixture.

Chloro-carbonic, Chloro-carbonous (klō'rō-kär-bon"ik, klō-rō-kär'bon-us), a. Terms applied to a compound of chlorine and carbonic oxide ($COCl_2$) formed by exposing a mixture of the two gases to the direct solar rays.

Chlorocyanic (klō'rō-sī-an"ik), a. [Gr. chloros, greenish-yellow, and kyaneos, dark-blue.] Consisting of chlorine and cyanogen combined; as, chlorocyanic acid.

Chlorodyne (klō'rō-dīn or klō'rō-din), n. [Chlor-, from chloroform, and Gr. odynē, pain.] A popular anodyne remedy, consisting of morphia, chloroform, prussic acid, extract of Indian hemp, &c.

Chloroform (klō'rō-form), n. [From chlor in perchloride, and form- in formyle.] (C_2HCl_3.) The perchloride of formyle, a volatile colourless liquid, of an agreeable, fragrant, sweetish apple taste and smell, of the specific gravity of 1·48, and discovered by Soubeiran and Liebig in 1832. It is prepared by cautiously distilling together a mixture of alcohol, water, and chloride of lime or bleaching-powder. Its use as an anæsthetic was introduced in 1847 by Prof. (afterwards Sir James Y.) Simpson of Edinburgh. For this purpose its vapour is inhaled. The inhalation of chloroform first produces slight intoxication; then, frequently, slight muscular contractions, unruliness, and dreaming; then loss of voluntary motion and consciousness, the patient appearing as if sound asleep; and at last, if too much be given, death by coma and syncope. When skilfully administered in proper cases, it is considered one of the safest of anæsthetics; but it requires to be used under certain precautions, as its application has frequently proved fatal. Chloroform is a powerful solvent, dissolving resins, wax, iodine, &c., as well as strychnine and other alkaloids. It is a felony for any person to administer or attempt to administer chloroform or other stupefying drug with intent to enable himself or another to commit or to assist another in the commission of any indictable offence, 24 and 25 Vict. c.

Chloroform (klō'rō-form), v.t. To put under the influence of chloroform; to render unconscious and insensible to pain by the administration of chloroform; to treat with chloroform.

Chloroformization (klō'rō-form-iz-ā"shon), n. In surg. the aggregate of anæsthetic phenomena resulting from the inhalation of chloroform.

Chlorogenic (klō-rō-gen'ik), a. [Gr. chlōros, yellowish-green, and gennaō, to produce.] See CAFFEIC.

Chloroid (klor'oid), a. [E. *chlor*ine, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] Resembling chlorine; as, the chloroid pole of a galvanic battery. See Chlorous Pole under CHLOROUS.

Chlorometer (klō-rom'et-ėr), n. [From chlor- in chlorine, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for testing the decolouring or bleaching powers of chloride of lime. It is also used for testing chloride of potash and of soda.

Chlorometry (klō-rom'e-tri), n. The name given to the process for testing the decolouring power of any combination of chlorine, but especially of the commercial articles, the chlorides of lime, potash, and soda.

Chloromys (klō'rō-mis), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and mys, a mouse.] See AGOUTI.

Chloropal (klō-rō'pal), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and E. opal. Lit. green opal.] A mineral of two varieties, the conchoidal and the earthy; the conchoidal is of a pistachio-green colour, the other has an earthy fracture; and both varieties are possessed of magnetic properties. It is a hydrated silicate of iron.

Chlorophæite, Chloropheite (klō'rō-fē-īt), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and phaios, blackish.] A rare mineral found in amygdaloidal trap-rocks. It is translucent and of a green colour when newly broken, but soon becomes black and opaque. It has been supposed to be decomposed olivine, and consists of 32·85 silica, 22·08 iron peroxide, 3·44 magnesia, and 41·63 water.

Chlorophane (klō'rō-fān), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and phainō, to show.] A variety of fluor-spar which exhibits a bright-green phosphorescent light when heated.

Chlorophyll (klō'rō-fil), n. [Gr. chlōros, green, and phyllon, a leaf.] The green colouring matter of plants. It is somewhat analogous to wax, is soluble in ether and alcohol, but insoluble in water, and floats in the fluid of the cells in the form of minute granules. In this form it occurs in the a, Spiral bands of Chlorophyll in Spirogyra. b, Irregular mass in Zygnema. c, Granules in cells of the leaf.

cells of flowering plants generally, especially in the leaves, and below the epidermis of green stems. In Vallisneria and some other aquatic plants the granules are large, and imbedded in the circulating protoplasm of the cells. In some confervoid algæ the chlorophyll is arranged in plates or bands, while in others it forms a granular stratum, with numerous large bright granules scattered through it. In the Protococcaceæ, and in the gonidia of lichens, the chlorophyll is uniformly distributed through the protoplasm of the cell. The chlorophyll granule consists of two separable parts—the green colouring matter, which is soluble in alcohol, leaving a colourless body the size and form of the granule. Chlorophyll plays an important part in the life of the plant, as it breaks up the carbonic acid gas taken in by the stomata of the leaves into its two elements, carbon and oxygen, returning the oxygen to the air, and converting the carbon with the water obtained from the roots into starch. Light is indispensable to the formation of chlorophyll, and hence arises the etiolation or blanching of plants by privation of light, either by the art of the gardener or from accidental causes.

Chlorophyllian (klō-rō-fil'i-an), a. Pertaining to chlorophyll; containing chlorophyll. 'Chlorophyllian cells.' Allman.

Chlorops (klō'rops), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and ōps, the eye.] A genus of insects. See CORN-FLY.

Chlorosis (klō-rō'sis), n. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow.] 1. The green-sickness, a peculiar form of anæmia or bloodlessness which affects young females, more especially those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale or greenish hue of the skin, weakness, palpitation, dyspepsy, &c. 2. In bot. same as Etiolation.

Chlorospermeæ (klō-rō-spėr'mē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. chlōros, greenish-yellow, and sperma, a seed.] A name given to that division of the algæ which have grass-green fronds, very rarely purple, olive, or red. They grow either in the sea, in fresh water, or in damp situations, and are of very simple organization.

Chlorotic (klō-rot'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to chlorosis; as, chlorotic affections.—2. Affected by chlorosis. 'The extasies of sedentary and chlorotick nuns.' Battie.

Chlorous (klō'rus), a. Pertaining to or containing chlorine: specifically, containing chlorine in larger proportion than chloric compounds; as, chlorous oxide, chlorous acid. —Chlorous acid ($HClO_2$), an acid obtained by mixing oil of vitriol very gradually and cautiously with chlorate of potassium, and condensing the gas which is given off in water. The gas which is thus condensed is called chlorous anhydride (Cl_2O_3): it is extremely explosive.—Chlorous pole, a term applied, on the electrical hypothesis, to the negative pole of a galvanic battery, from its exhibiting the attraction which is characteristic of chlorine. The positive pole, according to the same hypothesis, is termed the zincous or zincoid pole. Called also Chloroid Pole.

Chloroxylon (klō-rok'si-lon), n. [Gr. chlōros, yellowish-green, and xylon, wood.] A genus of timber trees, nat. order Meliaceæ, containing a single species, C. Swietenia (the satin-wood tree of India). See SATIN-WOOD.

Chloruret (klō'rụ-ret), n. A compound of chlorine: a name formerly given to what is now termed Chloride.

Choak† (chōk). Same as Choke.

Choanite (kō'an-īt), n. [Gr. choanē, a funnel.] A genus of spongiform fossil zoophytes of the chalk, familiarly called 'petrified anemones,' from having the radiating appearance of a sea-anemone.

Choar (chōr), n. The Hindu name for a mountain thief or robber. Eclec. Rev.

Chock (chok), n. [Perhaps from shock (as if shock-piece), a jolt or collision, the use of chocks being often to prevent jolting.] Naut. a piece of wood employed in filling up a deficiency, as a wedge or block, for confining a cask or other body to prevent it from moving. In the construction of framing, a chock is an angular, commonly a triangular shaped piece, made to fit the space between the attenuated ends at the joints, to which it is fastened by means of tree-nails.—Chocks of the rudder are pieces of timber kept in readiness to stop the motion of the rudder in case of an accident, &c.—Anchor chocks, pieces indented in the shank of a wooden anchor-stock when it is defective.—Boat's chocks, clamps on which a boat rests when stowed on deck.

Chock (chok), adv. Naut. fully; close; as far as possible; as, chock aft, chock out, &c.

Chock (chok), v.t. Naut. to put a chock into or under; as, to chock the timbers of a ship; to chock a cask. See the noun.

Chock (chok), v.i. To fill up a cavity like a chock. 'The wood-work exactly chocked into the joints.' Fuller.

Chock† (chok), n. [A form of shock (which see).] An encounter.

One of the kings of France died miserably by the chock of a hog. Bp. Patrick.

Chock† (chok), v.t. To give a shock to. Turberville.

Chock-a-block (chok'a-blok), a. [See CHOCK and BLOCK.] 1. A term used to designate the position of tackling when the blocks are hauled close together.—2. Crowded; crammed; as, the meeting-hall was chock-a-block. [Colloq.]

Chock-full (chok'fụl), a. Same as Choke-full.

Chocolate (chok'ō-lāt), n. [Sp. chocolate; Mex. chocolatl — choco, cocoa, and latl, water.] 1. A paste or cake composed of the kernels of the Theobroma Cacao ground and combined with sugar and vanilla, cinnamon, cloves, or other flavouring substance. Cacao, under its native name of chocolatl, had been for ages used as a beverage by the Mexicans, before their country was conquered by the Spaniards. It is less used in Britain than cocoa, which is a slightly different preparation from the kernels of the same tree.—2. The beverage made by dissolving chocolate in boiling water or milk.

Chocolate (chok'ō-lāt), a. Having the colour of chocolate; as, chocolate cloth.

Chocolate-house (chok'ō-lāt-hous), n. A house of entertainment in which chocolate is sold. Tatler.

Chocolate-nut (chok'ō-lāt-nut). See CACAO.

Chocolate-root (chok'ō-lāt-röt), n. See GEUM.

Chode (chōd), the old preterit of chide (which see). Gen. xxxiii. 36.

Choice (chois), n. [O.E. choyse, choise, chois; from O.Fr. chois, a choice, from choisir, to choose; from the German. See CHOOSE.] 1. The act of choosing; the voluntary act of selecting or separating from two or more things that which is preferred; selection; election.

Ye know how that a good while ago God made choice among us that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe. Acts xv. 7.

2. The power of choosing; option.

Where there is force there can be no choice. N. Grew.

3. Care in selecting; judgment or skill in distinguishing what is to be preferred, and in giving a preference.

Julius Cæsar did write a collection of apophthegms; it is a pity his book is lost; for I imagine they were collected with judgment and choice. Bacon.

4. The thing chosen; that which is approved and selected in preference to others' selection.

I am sorry . . .
Your choice is not so rich in birth as beauty. Shak.

5. The best part of anything; a select assemblage.

A braver choice of dauntless spirits
Did never float upon the swelling tide. Shak.

6. A collection to choose from; as, you have there a choice of six different colours.—To hold in most rich choice, to hold in very high estimation. Shak.—To make choice of, to choose; to select; to separate and take in preference.—Of choice, of worth or value; as, men of choice.

Choice (chois), a. 1. Carefully selected. 'Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach of ordinary men.' Wordsworth.—2. Worthy of being preferred; select; precious; very valuable. 'The choice and master spirits of this age.' Shak.

Thus in a sea of folly toss'd,
My choicest hours of life are lost. Swift.

Choler (kol'ėr), n. [O.Fr. cholere (Fr. colère), choler, anger, L. cholera, a bilious ailment, from Gr. cholera, from cholē, bile, anger.] 1.† The bile. Sir T. Browne. By the superabundance of this fluid anger was formerly supposed to be produced. Hence—2. Anger; wrath; irascibility. 'Had his choler roused.' Burke. 'Old but full of force and choler.' Tennyson.

Throw cold water on thy choler. Shak.

Cholera (kol'ėr-a), n. [L., bile, a bilious complaint. See CHOLER.] The name applied to two diseases utterly dissimilar; the one known more fully by the name of common or English cholera, and the other by that of cholera morbus or malignant cholera. Some pathologists recognize a third variety under the name of cholera asphyxia. The common cholera is a bilious disease, long known in this and most other countries, and consists in copious vomiting and purging of bilious matter, with violent griping, cramps of the muscles of the abdomen and lower extremities, and great depression of strength. It is most prevalent at the end of summer or the beginning of autumn. Cholera morbus, by far the more terrible of the two, is in many respects one of the most remarkable diseases that have ever afflicted the human race. The disease, in its more ordinary form, commences with sickness, vomiting, or perhaps two or three loose evacuations of the bowels; after which follow a sense of burning at the præcordia, an increased purging and vomiting of a white or colourless fluid, great prostration of strength, spasms at the extremities, which increase in violence with the vomiting and purging. Such cases last from twelve to thirty-six hours; after this the patient generally sinks into a state of extreme collapse, and this stage in most cases passes by a gradual transition into a febrile one, which in a majority of instances proves fatal. Cholera asphyxia, a disease differing from ordinary cholera morbus in a more rapid progress, in producing more violent spasms, in asphyxia or cessation of pulse, and speedy death.

Choleraic (kol-ėr-ā'ik), a. Relating to cholera; as, choleraic virus.

Choleric (kol'ėr-ik), a. 1. Abounding with choler or bile. Dryden.—2. Easily irritated; irascible; inclined to anger; as, a choleric man. 'Somewhat choleric and sudden.' Byron.

Chrome-green (krōm'grēn), n. A beautiful dark-green pigment prepared from the oxide of chromium.

Chrome-iron (krōm'ī-ėrn), n. Chromate of iron. See under CHROMATE.

Chrome-orange (krōm'or-anj), n. A bright yellow pigment, consisting of chromate of lead.

Chrome-red (krōm'red), n. A beautiful red pigment prepared from red-lead. It is a basic chromate of lead.

Chrome-yellow (krōm'yel-lō), n. A name given to chromate of lead, from its colour. It is a brilliant yellow pigment much used in the arts.

Chromic (krō'mik), a. Pertaining to chrome or chromium, or obtained from it; as, chromic acid. This acid (Cr_2O_3, more properly termed chromic oxide) destroys the colour of indigo and of most vegetable and animal colouring matters, a property advantageously employed in calico-printing. It forms coloured salts with alkaline bases, the most important of which is chromate of lead, which is of a rich yellow colour, and is largely employed in the arts of painting and dyeing.

Chromidæ, Chromides (krom'i-dē, krom'i-dēz), n. pl. [Gr. chromis, a kind of sea-fish, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of teleostean fishes, generally inhabiting the fresh waters of hot climates, allied to the Labridæ or true wrasses. Some are good eating, and one Nile species, with cycloid instead of, as in the others, ctenoid scales, is reckoned the best in the river.

Chromion (krō'mi-on), n. Same as Chromium.

Chromism (krōm'izm), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] In bot. an unnatural colouring of plants or leaves.

Chromite (krōm'īt), n. A mineral containing chromium.

Chromium (krō'mi-um), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] Sym. Cr. At. wt. 52·4. A metal which forms very hard steel-gray masses; it never occurs native, but may be obtained by reducing the oxide. In its highest degree of oxidation it forms a salt of a ruby-red colour. It takes its name from the various and beautiful colours which its oxide and acid communicate to minerals into whose composition they enter. Chromium is employed to give a fine deep green to the enamel of porcelain, to glass, &c. The oxide of chromium is of a bright grass-green or pale yellow colour. Also called Chrome and sometimes Chromion.

Chromo (krō'mō), n. A contraction for Chromo-lithograph.

Chromochre, Chrome-stone (krōm'ō-kėr, krōm'stōn), n. A mineral containing the oxides of chrome and of iron, silica, and alumina. It occurs in loose earthy masses, of a fine yellowish green, generally so mixed up with the rock in which it occurs as to be separable only by chemical means.

Chromogen (krō'mō-jen), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and gennaō, to produce.] Same as Chromule.

Chromogenic (krō-mō-jen'ik), a. Pertaining to chromogen.

Chromograph (krō'mō-graf), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and graphō, to write.] A coloured engraving.

Chromolith (krō'mō-lith), n. A short form of Chromo-lithograph.

Chromo-lithograph (krō-mō-lith'o-graf), n. A picture obtained by means of chromolithography.

Chromo-lithographer (krō-mō-li-thog'raf-ėr), n. One who practises chromo-lithography.

Chromo-lithographic (krō-mō-lith'o-graf''ik), a. Pertaining to chromo-lithography.

Chromo-lithography (krō''mō-li-thog'ra-fi), n. A method of producing a coloured or tinted lithographic picture, by using various stones having different portions of the picture drawn upon them with inks of various colours and so arranged as to blend into a complete picture. Sometimes so many as twenty different colours are employed. In printing the lighter shades are printed off first and the darkest last.

Chromosphere (krō'mō-sfēr), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour, and sphaira, a sphere.] The name given to the gaseous envelope supposed to exist round the body of the sun, through which the light of the photosphere passes. J. N. Lockyer. — Stellar chromosphere, the gaseous envelope supposed to exist round the body of a star.

Chromospheric (krō-mō-sfer'ik), a. Pertaining or relating to a chromosphere; as, the chromospheric spectrum.

Chromotrope, n. See CHROMATROPE.

Chromotype, n. See CHROMATYPE.

Chromule (krō'mūl), n. [Gr. chrōma, colour.] The colouring matter of plants other than green. Called also Chromogen.

Chronic (kron'ik), a. [Gr. chronikos, from chronos, time, duration.] 1. Pertaining to time; having reference to time. — 2. Continuing a long time, as a disease. A chronic disease is one which is inveterate or of long continuance, in distinction from an acute disease, which speedily terminates.

Chronical† (kron'ik-al), a. Same as Chronic, 1.

> Partly on a chronical and partly on a topical method. J. A. Alexander.

Chronicle (kron'i-kl), n. [Fr. chronique, a chronicle. See CHRONIC.] 1. A historical account of facts or events disposed in the order of time; a history, more especially one of a simple, unpretentious character. 'Irish chronicles which are most fabulous and forged.' Spenser. — 2. That which contains, conveys, or suggests history.

> Europe . . . her very ruins tell the history of times gone by, and every mouldering stone is a chronicle. Irving.

3. pl. The title of two books of the Old Testament, consisting mainly of the annals of the kingdom of Judah. The authorship is commonly ascribed to Ezra. — History, Chronicle, Annals. See under HISTORY.

Chronicle (kron'i-kl), v.t. pret. & pp. chronicled; ppr. chronicling. To record in history or chronicle; to record; to register. 'To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.' Shak.

Chronicler (kron'i-klėr), n. A writer of a chronicle; a recorder of events in the order of time.

> After my death I wish no other herald, . . .
> But such an honest chronicler as Griffith. Shak.

Chroniclist (kron'i-klist), n. A chronicler. Shelton.

Chronicon (kron'i-kon), n. Same as Chronicle.

Chronique† (kron'ik), n. A chronicle. L. Addison.

Chronogram (kron'ō-gram), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and gramma, a letter or writing, from graphō, to write.] An inscription in which a certain date or epoch is expressed by numeral letters, as in the motto of a medal struck by Gustavus Adolphus in 1632.

> ChrIstVs DVX; ergo trIVMphVs.

Chronogrammatic, Chronogrammatical (kron'ō-gram-mat''ik, kron'ō-gram-mat''ik-al), a. Belonging to a chronogram; containing a chronogram. 'A chronogrammatical verse.' Howell.

Chronogrammatically (kron'ō-gram-mat''ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of a chronogram. Wood.

Chronogrammatist (kron-ō-gram'mat-ist), n. A writer of chronograms. Addison.

Chronograph (kron'ō-graf), n. 1. A chronogram. — 2. The name given to various devices for measuring and registering very minute portions of time with extreme precision. Benson's chronograph is, in principle, a lever watch with a double seconds hand, the one superimposed on the other. The outer end of the lowermost hand has a small cup filled with a black viscid fluid, with a minute hole at the bottom, while the corresponding end of the uppermost is bent down so as just to reach the hole. At the starting (say) of a horse-race, the observer pulls a string, whereupon the bent end of the upper hand passes through the hole and makes a black mark on the dial, instantly rebounding. Again, as each horse passes the winning post, the string is redrawn and a dot made, and thus the time occupied by each horse is noted. This chronograph registers to one-tenth of a second. Strange's chronograph is connected with the pendulum of an astronomical clock, which makes a mark on a sheet of paper at the beginning and end of each swing. By touching a spring on the appearance (say) of a particular star on the field of a telescope, an additional dot is made intermediate between the two extreme ones, and by measuring the distance of this from either of these extremes the exact time can be ascertained to one-hundredth of a second. Schultze's chronograph, in which electricity is applied, is yet far more precise, registering time to the five-hundred-thousandth part of a second. By it the initial velocity of a cannon-bullet may be ascertained. This name has also been given to the class of instruments described under Chronoscope.

Chronographer (kro-nog'raf-ėr), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and graphō, to describe.] One who writes concerning time or the events of time; a chronologer. 'Our monkish and succeeding chronographers.' Selden.

Chronography (kro-nog'ra-fi), n. The description or investigation of past events; chronology. [Rare.]

Chronologer (kro-nol'o-jėr), n. Same as Chronologist.

Chronologic, Chronological (kron-o-loj'ik, kron-o-loj'ik-al), a. Relating to chronology; containing an account of events in the order of time; according to the order of time; as, a chronologic table; a chronological narrative.

Chronologically (kron-o-loj'ik-al-li), adv. In a chronological manner; in a manner according with the order of time, the series of events, or rules of chronology.

Chronologist (kro-nol'o-jist), n. One versed in chronology; a person who investigates the dates of past events and transactions.

Chronology (kro-nol'o-ji), n. [Gr. chronologia — chronos, time, and logos, discourse or doctrine.] The science of time: (a) the method of measuring or computing time by regular divisions or periods, according to the revolutions of the sun or moon: this is what is termed astronomical or mathematical chronology. (b) The science of ascertaining the true periods or years when past events or transactions took place, and arranging them in their proper order according to their dates: this is what is called historical chronology, and when the word chronology is used without a qualifying term it has this signification.

Chronometer (kro-nom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and metron, measure.] 1. Any instrument that measures time or that divides time into equal portions, or that is used for that purpose, as a clock, watch, or dial. Specifically, this term is applied to those time-keepers which are used for determining the longitude at sea, or for any other purpose where an accurate measure of time is required, with great portability in the instrument. The chronometer differs from the ordinary watch in the principle of its escapement, which is so constructed that the balance is free from the wheels during the greater part of its vibration, and also in being fitted with a 'compensation adjustment,' calculated to prevent the expansion and contraction of the metal by the action of heat and cold from affecting its movements. Marine chronometers generally beat half seconds, and are hung in gimbals in boxes 6 or 8 inches square. The pocket chronometer does not differ in appearance from a watch except that it is somewhat larger. In some cases these beat four-tenth seconds. — To rate a chronometer is to ascertain the exact rate of its gain or loss as compared with true time, for the purpose of making the proper allowance in computations dependent thereon. — 2. In music, a name sometimes given to what is properly called a metronome (which see).

Chronometric, Chronometrical (kron-o-met'rik, kron-o-met'rik-al), a. Pertaining to a chronometer; measured by a chronometer. — Chronometrical governor, an improved regulator for rendering the mean velocity of an engine uniform.

Chronometry (kro-nom'et-ri), n. The art of measuring time; the measuring of time by periods or divisions.

Chronoscope (kron'o-skōp), n. [Gr. chronos, time, and skopeō, to observe.] An instrument for measuring the duration of extremely short-lived phenomena; more especially, the name given to instruments of various forms for measuring the velocity of projectiles. The most general arrangement consists of a series of screens through which a bullet is made to pass; the rupture of each screen breaking for a moment the continuity of an electric current, setting in action an electro-magnetic machine, and making a permanent mark or record.

Chrysalid (kris'a-lid), n. A chrysalis.

Chrysalis (kris'a-lis), n. The pl. is properly Chrysalides (kri-sal'i-dēz). [Gr. chrysallis, a grub, from chrysos, gold, from its golden colour.] A form which butterflies, moths, and most other insects assume when they change from the state of larva or caterpillar and before they arrive at their winged or perfect state. In the chrysalis form the animal is in a state of rest or insensibility, and exists without nutriment, the length of time varying with the species and season. During this period an elaboration is going on in the interior of the chrysalis, giving to the organs of the future animal their proper development before it breaks its envelope.

The form of the case of the chrysalis varies with different families and orders. Those of lepidopterous insects are generally inclosed in a somewhat horny membranous case, and generally of a more or less angular form, pointed at the abdominal end and sometimes at both ends. Before the caterpillar undergoes its transformation into this state it often spins for itself a silken cocoon, within which the chrysalis is concealed. In most of the Coleoptera the legs of the chrysalis are in distinct sheaths; in the Lepidoptera they are not distinct; in the locust tribe, and many other insects, the chrysalis resembles the perfect insect, and differs from the latter principally in not having the wings complete. Called also Aurelia and Pupa.

Chrysanthemum (kri-san'thē-mum), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and anthemon, a flower.] A large genus of composite plants, consisting of herbs or shrubs with single large-stalked yellow flowers or with many small flowers; the rays are sometimes white. Two species are common weeds in Britain, C. Leucanthemum (the ox-eye daisy), a meadow plant with white ray-flowers, and C. segetum (the corn-marigold), a cornfield weed with golden yellow ray-flowers. The chrysanthemum of gardens is a Chinese half-shrubby plant (C. sinense), whose numerous varieties constitute one of the chief ornaments of gardens in the months of October, November, and December.

Chryselephantine (kris'el-ē-fan"tīn), a. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and elephas, elephantos, ivory.] Composed or partly composed of gold and ivory: a term specially applied to statues overlaid with gold and ivory. The colossal statue of Athēnē by the ancient Greek sculptor Phidias is the most celebrated statue thus treated.

Chrysene (kris'ēn), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, from its colour.] ($C_{18}H_{12}$.) A hydrocarbon which occurs in the least volatile portion of crude anthracene. It is crystalline, without taste or smell, and of a fine yellow colour.

Chrysididæ (kri-sid'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of hymenopterous insects. About six or seven species belong to this country. Some of the species are called ruby-tailed flies or golden-wasps. See GOLDEN-WASP.

Chrysobalanus (kris-ō-bal'a-nus), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and balanos, an acorn or acorn-shaped fruit.] A genus of trees or shrubs, natives of tropical America and Africa, nat. order Rosaceæ. They are simple-leaved plants, with small white flowers and fleshy fruits, which, in one species, C. Icaco, is edible. It is called the cocoa-plum, is about the size of a plum, with a sweet pulp and a hard six-grooved kernel.

Chrysoberyl (kris'ō-ber-il), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and bēryllion, beryl.] A siliceous gem, of a dilute yellowish-green colour, usually found in round pieces about the size of a pea, but also found crystallized in eight-sided prisms. It is next to the sapphire in hardness, and employed in jewelry, the specimens which present an opalescent play of light being especially admired. It is an aluminate of glucina, composed of about 80 per cent alumina and nearly 20 of glucina, with traces of silica, iron, &c. It is found in Ceylon, Peru, Siberia, Brazil, and Connecticut.

Chrysochlore (kris'ō-klōr), n. A mole-like animal of the genus Chrysochloris.

Chrysochloris (kris'ō-klō-ris), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and chlōros, greenish-yellow.] A genus of South African insectivorous mammals allied to the moles, so called from the brilliant green and gold metallic hues of their fur. C. aureus, the Cape chrysochlore or changeable mole, is the best-known species.

Chrysocolla (kris'ō-kol-la), n. [Gr. chrysokolla, glue of gold—chrysos, gold, and kolla, glue.] A silicate of the protoxide of copper of a fine emerald green colour, apparently produced from the decomposition of copper ores, which it usually accompanies. It derives its name from its weak resinous lustre and the peculiar transparency of its fractured edges. Page.

Chrysography (kri-sog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and graphō, to write.] 1. The art of writing in letters of gold.—2. The writing itself thus executed.

Chrysolite (kris'ō-līt), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and lithos, stone.] A mineral composed of silica, magnesium, and iron. Its prevailing colour is some shade of green. It is harder than glass, but less hard than quartz; often transparent, sometimes only translucent. Very fine specimens are found in Egypt and Brazil, but it is not of high repute as a jeweller's stone.

Chrysology (kri-sol'o-ji), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and logos, discourse.] That branch of political economy which relates to the production of wealth.

Chryso-magnet (kris'ō-mag-net), n. A loadstone. Addison.

Chrysomelidæ (kris-ō-mel'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. chrysos, gold, melas, black.] A family of coleopterous insects, of the section Tetramera of Latreille, so named from their brilliant metallic tints. They constitute a numerous and beautiful family of the beetle tribe. The typical genus Chrysomela contains the Colorado beetle (C. decemlineata). The bloody-nose beetle (Timarcha lævigata), the largest of the family, is a well-known British species.

Chrysophanic (kris-ō-fan'ik), a. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and phainō, to show, to appear.] A term applied to a volatile and fusible acid, the colouring matter of rhubarb. It crystallizes in fine yellow tables, and with potash gives a fine purple solution, and thus affords a delicate test for the presence of alkalies. Called also Rhabarbarin.

Chrysophilite (kri-sof'il-īt), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and philos, a lover.] A lover of gold. Lamb. [Rare.]

Chrysophyllum (kris-ō-fil'lum), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and phyllon, a leaf, so called from the golden colour of the under side of their leaves.] A genus of West Indian trees, with milky juice, and beautiful leaves covered below with golden hairs. Some are cultivated as foliage plants. C. Cainito produces a delicious fruit called the star-apple. The genus belongs to the nat. order Sapotaceæ.

Chrysoprase (kris'ō-prāz), n. [Gr. chrysoprasos—chrysos, gold, and prason, a leek.] A kind of quartz, being merely a variety of chalcedony. Its colour is commonly apple-green, and often extremely beautiful, so that it is much esteemed in jewelry. It is translucent, or sometimes semi-transparent, and of a hardness little inferior to that of flint. It is found in Lower Silesia and Vermont.

Chrysoprasus (kri-sop'raz-us), n. Latin form of Chrysoprase. Rev. xxi. 20.

Chrysops (kris'ops), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and ōps, eye.] A genus of dipterous insects of the family Tabanidæ; the clegs. Three species are found in this country, all of which are great blood-suckers, and troublesome to cattle in summer and even to man. Their larvæ are useful to the farmer in destroying aphides, and are called aphis-lions. The name of the genus is derived from the sparkling gold-coloured eyes of the species when alive.

Chrysops cæcutiens, Common Cleg (female).

Chrysosperm† (kris'ō-spėrm), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and sperma, seed.] A means of producing gold. B. Jonson. [Rare.]

Chrysotype (kris'ō-tīp), n. [Gr. chrysos, gold, and typos, impression.] In photog. (a) the name given to a photographic process, from its being chiefly produced by a solution of gold. (b) A photographic agent prepared by impregnating paper with a neutral solution of chloride of gold. It produces a picture with a splendid purple ground. (c) A picture produced by this process.

Chuana (chu'ä-na), a. Same as Bantu.

Chub (chub), n. [So called probably from its chubbiness or plumpness.] A river fish, of the genus Cyprinus or carps; or, as some regard it, of the sub-genus Leuciscus. The body is oblong, nearly round; the head and back green, the sides silvery, and the belly white. It frequents deep holes in rivers shaded by trees, but in warm weather floats near the surface, and furnishes sport for anglers. It is indifferent food, and rarely attains the weight of 5 lbs. Called also Cheven.

Chubbed (chub'ed or chubd), a. Chubby. Johnson. [Rare.]

Chubbedness (chub'ed-nes or chubd'nes), n. Chubbiness. [Rare.]

Chubbiness (chub'i-nes), n. The state of being chubby; as, a child of remarkable chubbiness.

Chubb-key (chub'kē), n. A key for a Chubb-lock.

Chubb-lock (chub'lok), n. [From the name of its inventor, a London locksmith.] A lock having more tumblers than usual, with the addition of a lever called the detector, which is so fixed that while it does not act under the ordinary application of the key, yet cannot fail to move if any one of the tumblers be lifted a little too high, as must be the case in any attempt at picking. This movement fixes the bolt immovably, and renders all further attempts at picking useless.

Chubby (chub'i), a. [Same root as E. chump, and probably chop; Sw. dial. kubbug, fat, plump, kubb, a lump, a block; comp. also chuffy, fat.] Round-faced; plump. 'Round chubby faces and high cheek-bones.' Cook's Voyages.

Then came a chubby child and sought relief,
Sobbing in all the impotence of grief. Crabbe.

Chub-cheeked (chub'chēkt), a. Having full or chubby cheeks. [Rare.]

Chubdar (chub'där), n. [Hind. chobdar.] In India, a servant whose business it is to announce the arrival of company; a mace-bearer.

Chub-faced (chub'fāst), a. Having a plump round face.

I never saw a fool lean: the chub-faced fop Shines sleek. Marston.

Chuck (chuk), n. [Probably same as chock.] In turnery, an appendage to fix any material for the purpose of turning it into any determinate form. The term, therefore, includes all those contrivances which serve to connect the material to be operated upon to the mandril of the lathe. Simple chucks are such as are capable only of communicating a motion round a determinate axis, such as they themselves receive. Complicated chucks are those by means of which the axis of the work can be changed at pleasure, such as eccentric chucks, oval chucks, segment, engine, and geometric chucks, &c.

Chuck (chuk), n. [Imitative; comp. cluck.] The voice or call of a hen and some other birds, or a sound resembling that.

Chuck (chuk), v.i. 1. To make the noise which a hen and some other birds make when they call their chickens.—2.† To jeer; to laugh mockingly; to chuckle. Marston.

Chuck (chuk), v.t. To call upon, as a hen her chickens. Dryden.

Chuck (chuk), n. Corrupted from chick. 'Pray, chuck, come hither.' Shak.

Chuck (chuk), v.t. [A modification of shock, chock, and formerly written chock.] 1. To strike or give a gentle blow.

Come, chuck the infant under the chin. Congreve.

2. To throw, with quick motion, a short distance; to pitch; as, chuck the beggar a copper. [Colloq.]

Chuck (chuk), n. 1. A slight blow under the chin.—2. A toss, as with the fingers; a short throw.

Chuckabiddy (chuk'a-bid-di). Same as Chickabiddy.

Chuck-a-by (chuk'a-bī), n. A term of endearment.

Chuck-farthing (chuk'fär-ᵀᴴing), n. A play in which a farthing is pitched or chucked into a hole.

He lost his money at chuck-farthing, shuffle-cap, and all-fours. Arbuthnot.

Chuck-full (chuk'fụl). A colloquial form of Chock-full or Choke-full.

Chuck-hole (chuk'hōl), n. A steep hole in a wagon-rut.

Chuckie (chuk'i), n. [Scotch.] 1. A barn-door fowl: used also as a term of endearment.—2. A chuckie-stane.

Chuckie-stane (chuk'i-stān), n. A pebble, such as children use in a game, in which they chuck a number of them up, catching them on the back of their hand as they fall. Sir W. Scott. [Scotch.]

Chuckle (chuk'l), v.t. pret. & pp. chuckled; ppr. chuckling. [A freq. and dim. from chuck, to cry like a hen.] 1. To call, as a hen her chickens.

If these birds are within distance, here's that will chuckle 'em together. Dryden.

2. To fondle; to cocker.

Your confessor, that parcel of holy guts and garbidge, he must chuckle you. Dryden.

Chuckle (chuk'l), v.i. 1. To cackle, as a hen or other fowl.

It cluttered here, it chuckled there;
It stirred the old wife's mettle. Tennyson.

2. [In this sense perhaps rather connected with choke than chuck.] To laugh in a suppressed or broken manner; to feel inward triumph or exultation.

The fellow rubbed his great hands and chuckled. Lord Lytton.

Chuckle (chuk'l), n. 1. The call of a hen and some other birds to their young.—2. A short suppressed laugh, expressive of satisfaction, exultation, and the like.

The Jew rubbed his hands with a chuckle. Dickens.

Chuckle-head (chuk'l-hed), n. A person with a large head; a dunce; a numskull.

Chuckle-headed (chuk'l-hed-ed), a. Having a chuckle-head; large or thick headed; stupid.

Chuckling (chuk'ling), p. and a. Laughing in a suppressed, choking manner; uttered in chuckles, as half-suppressed, triumphant, or derisive laughter; rejoicing or exulting without much demonstration.

Chuck-Will's-widow (chuk'wilz-wid'ō), n. In America, the popular name of a bird of the family Caprimulgidæ or goat-suckers, the Caprimulgus carolinensis.

Chud† (chud), v.t. To champ; to bite. Staffford.

Chudder (chud'dėr), n. In India, a wrapper made of silk muslin or cambric, used to envelop the upper part of a woman, and worn in loose folds.

Chuet† (chụ'et), n. See CHEWET.

Chuff† (chuf), n. [Perhaps from W. cuff, a stock or stump.] A coarse, heavy, dull, or surly fellow; a niggard; an old miser. 'Ye fat chuffs, I would your store were here.' Shak.

If he but steal a sheep from out the fold
The chuffe would hang him for it if he could.
John Taylor.

Chuff (chuf), a. [See CHUFFY.] 1.† Chuffy; swoln. Holland.—2. Surly; ill-tempered. [Provincial English.]

Chuffily (chuf'fi-li), adv. In a chuffy manner; surlily; clownishly. 'John answered chuffily.' Richardson.

Chuffiness (chuf'fi-nes), n. [See CHUFFY.] 1. Chubbiness.—2. Surliness.

Chuffy (chuf'fi), a. [In first sense apparently a form of chubby. (See CHUBBY.) In meaning 2 from chuff (the noun).] 1. Fat or swelled out, especially in the cheeks; chubby.—2. Blunt; clownish; surly; angry.

Chuffy-brick (chuf'fi-brik), n. A brick which is puffed out by the escape of rarefied air or steam in the process of burning.

Chulan (chō'lan), n. A Chinese plant, the Chloranthus inconspicuus, nat. order Chloranthaceæ, the spikes of the flowers of which are used to scent tea.

Chum (chum), n. [Abbrev. of chamber-fellow; Dr. Johnson calls it a term used in the universities.] One who lodges or resides in the same room or rooms; hence, a close companion; a bosom-friend; an intimate.

Chum (chum), v.i. To occupy the same room or rooms with another; to be the chum of some one. 'Wits forced to chum with common sense.' Churchill.

Chum (chum), v.t. pret. & pp. chummed; ppr. chumming. To put into the same rooms with another.

You'll be chummed on somebody to-morrow, and then you'll be all snug and comfortable. Dickens.

Chumar (chụ'mär), n. [Anglo-Indian.] A worker in leather; a shoemaker; a cobbler. W. H. Russell.

Chummage (chum'māj), n. Act or condition of chumming. In extract used adjectively.

Your chummage-ticket will be on twenty-seven, in the third. Dickens.

Chump (chump), n. [According to Skeat, the same word as Icel. kumbr, as seen in tré-kumbr, a tree-chump, a log, from kumbr, kubbr, a chopping, kubba, to chop, and therefore allied to E. chop, chub. Chunk appears to be merely a modified form of this.] A short, thick, heavy piece of wood.

Chutney, Chutnee (chut'ni, chut'nē), n. In the East Indies, a condiment compounded of sweets and acids. Ripe fruit (mangoes, raisins, &c.), spices, sour herbs, cayenne, lemon-juice, are the ordinary ingredients. They are pounded and boiled together, and then bottled for use.

Chylaceous (kī-lā'shus), a. Belonging to chyle; consisting of chyle.

Chylaqueous (kī-lak'wē-us), a. [E. chyle, and L. aqua, water.] Composed of chyle and water. — Chylaqueous fluid, the name given to a certain nutrient liquid, charged more or less abundantly with organized corpuscles, existing in certain of the invertebrate animals (e.g. the annelids and echinodermata), and forming the equivalent of the blood of vertebrates.

Chyle (kīl), n. [Gr. chylos, juice, humour, chyle, from cheō, to flow, whence also chyme.] In physiol. a white or milky fluid separated from aliments by means of digestion. Chyle is found in the intestines after the food has been mixed with the bile and pancreatic juice. It is absorbed by the lacteal vessels, terminating in the inner surface of the small intestines, chiefly the jejunum, and thence passes by numerous converging streams into the main trunk of the absorbent system, called the thoracic duct, through which it is gradually poured into the blood of the left subclavian vein at a short distance before it enters the right side of the heart. The chemical constituents of chyle are nearly the same as those of the blood itself.

Chyle-corpuscle (kīl'kor-pus-l), n. In physiol. one of a system of nucleated cells, often with tuberculated surfaces, of a grayish-white colour, subspherical in form, with a diameter of about $\frac{1}{2500}$ inch, developed in chyle. Called, when found in the blood, White Corpuscle.

Chylifaction (kī-li-fak'shon), n. [Chyle, and L. facio, to make.] The act or process by which chyle is formed from food in animal bodies.

Chylifactive (kī-li-fak'tiv), a. Forming or changing into chyle; having the power to make chyle; chylificatory; chylific.

Chyliferous (kī-lif'ėr-us), a. Chyle-bearing.

Chylific (kī-lif'ik), a. Chylifactive.

Chylification (kī'li-fi-kā''shon), n. The process by which the chyle is separated from the chyme. See CHYLIFACTION.

Chylificatory (kī-lif'i-kā-to-ri), a. Making chyle; chylifactive.

Chylify (kī'li-fī), v.t. and i. [Chyle, and L. facio, to make.] To convert or be converted into chyle.

Chylopoetic (kī'lō-pō-et''ik), a. [Gr. chylos, chyle, and poieō, to make.] Pertaining to or concerned in the formation of chyle; chylifactive; as, the chylopoetic organs.

Chylous (kī'lus), a. Consisting of, pertaining to, or resembling chyle.

Chymbe,† n. The prominent part of the staves beyond the head of a barrel; the chime or chimb.

Chyme (kīm), n. [Gr. chymos, juice. See CHYLE.] Digested food before the chyle is extracted. In the stomach it forms a pulpy mass which passes on into the small intestine, and being acted on by the bile, pancreatic fluid, and intestinal juice, is separated into chyle and non-nutritious matters, which latter are carried off by the evacuations.

Chymic, Chymical, Chymist, Chymistry (kim'ik, kim'ik-al, kim'ist, kim'ist-ri). See CHEMIC, CHEMICAL, &c.

Chymics† (kim'iks), n. Chemistry.

Chymification (kīm'i-fi-kā''shon), n. The process of becoming or of forming chyme.

Chymify (kīm'i-fī), v.t. and i. To form or be formed into chyme.

Chymistical,† Chymistically† (kim-ist'ik-al), a. Chemical. Burton.

Chymous (kīm'us), a. Pertaining to chyme.

Chynche,† a. Same as Chich.

Cibarious (si-bā'ri-us), a. [L. cibarius, from cibus, food.] Pertaining to food; useful for food; edible.

Cibation (si-bā'shon), n. [L. cibus, food.] In physiol. the act of taking food, particularly the more solid kinds.

Cibol (sib'ol), n. [Fr. ciboule, from L. cepula, dim. of cepa, an onion.] A plant of the onion genus, the Allium fistulosum, a native of Asia, but cultivated in various parts of the European continent and in England. Its leaves are fistular, and are used for culinary purposes like those of the chive, but they are much larger. It has no bulb; its root is perennial and fibrous.

Ciborium (si-bō'ri-um), n. [L., from Gr. kibōrion, the seed-vessel of the Egyptian bean, and a cup made from it or resembling it.] 1. Eccles. (a) the pyx. (b) A pendent tabernacle for the pyx. (c) A receptacle for relics. (d) A portable altar. (e) A case for displaying the calendar of feasts, placed in the nave of Greek churches. Rev. Orby Shipley.—2. In arch. an insulated building composed of an arched vault supported on four columns; a baldachino (which see).

> Ciderkin is made for common drinking, and supplies the place of small beer. Mortimer.

Cider-mill (sī'dėr-mil), n. A mill for crushing apples for making cider.

Cider-press (sī'dėr-pres), n. Same as Cider-mill.

Ci-devant (sē-de-voṅ), a. [Fr., from ci=ici (for L. hicce), here, and devant, representing L. de ab ante, lit. of from before.] Formerly; heretofore: applied generally to individuals who have held some office. 'The ci-devant commander.' Quart. Rev.

Ciel, Cieling (sēl, sēl'ing), n. Same as Ceil, Ceiling.

Cierge (sērj), n. [Fr., from L. cera, wax.] A candle carried in religious processions.

Cigar (si-gär'), n. [Fr. cigare, Sp. cigarro, originally the name of a kind of tobacco in Cuba.] A small roll of tobacco leaves carefully made up, and intended to be smoked by lighting at one end and drawing the smoke through it. It differs from a cheroot chiefly in form, having the mouth end pointed, the other cut square.

Cigarette (sig-ar-et'), n. [Fr. dim. of cigare.] A little fine tobacco rolled up in tissue paper so as to form a small cylinder, and lighted at one end for smoking.

Cigar-holder, Cigar-tube (si-gär'hōld-ėr, si-gär'tūb), n. A mouth-piece or tube used for smoking cigars.

Cilery (sil'ėr-i), n. [Contr. for ciliary, from its resemblance to the eyelash.] In arch. the drapery or foliage carved on the heads of columns.

Cilia (sil'i-a), n. pl. [L. cilium, an eyelash.] 1. In anat. the hairs which grow from the margin of the eyelids; eyelashes. Dunglison. 2. In bot. hairs or bristles situated on the margin of a vegetable body, as those of the inner peristome of a moss.—3. In physiol. small, generally microscopic, hair-like organs or appendages, averaging $\frac{1}{3000}$ inch in length, found on the surface of the tissues of most animals, and in some vegetable organisms (as Volvox), chiefly on tissues which are in contact with water or which produce fluid secretions. They are constantly in a state of active movement, and communicate to the fluid with which they are in contact the same motion. This is called vibratile or ciliary motion. In most of the lower animals the respiratory function is aided by means of the vibratile cilia, which propel currents of water over the gills; many animalcules move by a similar mechanism; and in the highest classes of animals vibratile cilia have a share in the performance of some important functions.

Ciliary (sil'i-a-ri), a. 1. Belonging to the eyelids.—Ciliary processes, the folds into which the choroid coat is gathered around the crystalline lens.—Ciliary circle or ligament, a kind of grayish ring, situated between the choroid membrane, the iris, and the sclerotica.—2. Pertaining to or performed by vibratile cilia; as, ciliary motion.

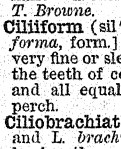
Ciliata (sil-i-ā'ta), n. pl. An order of infusorian animalcules, distinguished by the general possession of cilia. Vorticella and Paramecium are familiar examples.



Ciliated Leaf.

Ciliate, Ciliated (sil'i-āt, sil'i-āt-ed), a. Furnished with cilia; bearing cilia: (a) in bot. furnished or surrounded with hairs or fine bristles resembling the hairs of the eyelids: applied to leaves, corollæ, petals, &c. (b) In physiol. furnished with cilia endowed with vibratory motion; as, the ciliated epithelium lining the windpipe.

Cilice† (si-lis'), n. [See CILICIOUS.] A kind of garment made of haircloth. Southey.

Cilicious† (si-li'shus), a. [L. cilicium, Gr. kilikion, a coarse cloth made of the wool of goats of Cilicia.] Made or consisting of hair. 'A cilicious or sackcloth habit.' Sir T. Browne.

Ciliiform (sil'i-i-form), a. [Cilia, and L. forma, form.] Having the form of cilia; very fine or slender; specifically, applied to the teeth of certain fishes when numerous and all equally fine, as the teeth of the perch.

Ciliobrachiate (sil'i-ō-brak"i-āt), a. [Cilia, and L. brachium, the arm.] In physiol. having the arms furnished with cilia, as in Polyzoa.

Ciliograda, Ciliogrades (sil'i-ō-grā"da, sil'i-ō-grādz), n. pl. [Cilia, and L. gradior, to advance.] Same as Ctenophora.

Ciliograde (sil'i-ō-grād), a. [See above.] Moving by means of cilia.

Cill (sil), n. See SILL.

Cillo, Cillosis (sil'lō, sil-lō'sis), n. [Probably from L. cilium, an eyelid.] A constant spasmodic trembling of the upper eyelash. Sometimes called Life's-blood.

Cima (sī'ma). Same as Cyma.

Cimar (si-mär'). See SIMAR.

Cimbal (sim'bal), n. [It. ciambella.] A kind of cake. Nares.

Cimbex (sim'beks), n. [Gr. kimbēx, a bee-like insect.] A genus of hymenopterous insects, of the family Tenthredinidæ. They are amongst the largest species of saw-flies. The antennæ are clubbed at the end, and the larvæ make a cocoon.

Cimbia (sim'bi-a), n. In arch. a fillet or band round the shaft of a column to strengthen it.

Cimbric (sim'brik), a. Pertaining to the Cimbri, an ancient people of Europe, from whom Jutland was anciently called the Cimbric Chersonese.

Cimbric (sim'brik), n. The language of the Cimbri.

Cimeliarch † (si-mē'li-ärk), n. [L. cimeliarcha, Gr. keimēliarchēs, from keimēlion, treasure, and archō, to rule.] A superintendent or keeper of valuable things belonging to a church; also, the name given to the apartment in ancient churches where the plate and vestments are deposited. Gwilt.

Cimeter † (sim'e-tėr), n. A scimitar (which see).

Cimex (sī'meks), n. [L., a bug.] A Linnæan genus of hemipterous insects, sub-order Heteroptera. The bed-bug is the type of the genus. See BUG.

Cimia (sim'i-a), n. Same as Cimbia.

Cimicidæ (sī-mis'i-dē), n. pl. A family of hemipterous insects, having for its type the genus Cimex, or the bug. See BUG.

Cimicifuga (sī-mi-sif'ū-ga), n. [L. cimex, a bug, and fugo, to drive away.] A genus of plants, closely allied to Actæa, nat. order Ranunculaceæ; bugwort. The species are perennial herbs, having roots which act as drastic purgatives, and are poisonous. C. fœtida (stinking bugwort) is a very fetid plant, and is used for driving away bugs and fleas.

Cimiss † (sī'mis), n. The bed-bug. See CIMEX.

Cimiter † (sim'i-tėr), n. A scimitar.

Cimmerian (sim-mē'ri-an), a. 1. Pertaining to the Cimmerii, or Cimmerians, a mythical people mentioned by Homer as dwelling 'beyond the ocean-stream, where the sun never shines, and perpetual darkness reigns.' Later writers sought to localize them, and accordingly placed them either in Italy, near the Avernus, or in Spain, or in the Tauric Chersonese, and they represent them as dwelling in perpetual darkness, so that with the Romans the expression Cimmerian darkness (Cimmeriæ tenebræ) became proverbial. Hence—2. Very dark.

> There, under ebon shades, and low-brow'd rocks,
> As ragged as thy locks,
> In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell. Milton.

Cimolia † (si-mō'li-a), n. Cimolite (which see). Holland.

Cimolite (sim'ō-līt), n. [Fr. cimolite, from Gr. kimōlia (gē), Cimolian earth, from Gr. Kimōlos, L. Cimolus, one of the Cyclades, now Cimoli or Argentiera.] A species of clay, or hydrous silicate of magnesia, used by the ancients as a remedy for erysipelas and other inflammations. It is white, of a loose, soft texture, moulders into a fine powder, and effervesces with acids. It is useful in taking spots from cloth. Another species, of a purple colour, is the steatite or soap-rock. From another variety, found in the Isle of Wight, tobacco-pipes are made.

Cinchona (sin-kō'na), n. [The name given by Linnæus to the genus, and more properly written Chinchona, being so called after the Countess of Chinchon (pron. chin-chon', from Chinchon, a town in Spain, not far from Madrid), vice-queen of Peru, who was cured of fever by it in 1638, and assisted in spreading the remedy. The spelling and pronunciation here given appear to be well established, though neither can be considered correct.] 1. A genus of trees, belonging to the nat. order Rubiaceæ. There are numerous species, only some of which yield the valuable medicinal bark, the cinchona of commerce. Crown or loxa bark is furnished by C. Condaminea; gray or huanuco bark by C. micrantha and C. nitida; red bark by C. succirubra; yellow bark by C. Calisaya. They are all used as tonics and antiseptics, and particularly in the cure of ague and periodic nervous pains. Their active properties depend on the alkaloids cinchonin and quinine, which are found in the cellular tissue of the bark. The species are all trees or large shrubs growing on the Andes of tropical South America. They have been introduced extensively into India and Java, and are cultivated in other countries.—2. The medicinal bark of several species of cinchona; Peruvian bark.

Cinchona (Cinchona succirubra).

Cinchonaceæ (sin-kō-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of gamopetalous, calycifloral dicotyledons, sometimes regarded as a sub-order of the Rubiaceæ. They are trees, shrubs, or herbs, with simple opposite leaves; flowers arranged in panicles or corymbs; calyx adherent, entire or toothed; corolla regular; stamens attached to the corolla; ovary two-celled; fruit inferior, dry or succulent. They are chiefly found in tropical regions, and furnish some valuable products, especially in the shape of remedies for intermittent fevers, tonics, emetics, and purgatives, including Peruvian bark, ipecacuanha, coffee, &c.

Cinchonaceous (sin-kō-nā'shus), a. Pertaining to cinchona, or the plants of the order Cinchonaceæ.

Cinchonate (sin'kon-āt), n. A salt of cinchonic acid; a quinate.

Cinchonia (sin-kō'ni-a), n. Cinchonin (which see).

Cinchonic (sin-kon'ik), a. Of or belonging to cinchona; derived from cinchona; having the properties of cinchona; as, cinchonic acid. Called also Quinic, Kinic.

Cinchonin, Cinchonine (sin'kon-in), n. ($C_{20}H_{24}N_2O$.) An alkaloid obtained from the bark of several species of Cinchona, along with quinine, and one of the medicinal active principles of this bark. This vegetable alkaloid is contained in all the varieties of Cinchona, but principally in C. lancifolia, or pale bark. It crystallizes very readily, and is not so bitter as quinine, although highly febrifuge. It is very sparingly soluble in water, but very soluble in alcohol, especially when heated. With acids it forms crystallizable salts, which may be substituted for those of quinine.

Cinchonism (sin'kon-izm), n. In pathol. a disturbed condition of the system, the result of overdoses of cinchona or quinine.

Cincinnus (sin-sin'nus), n. [L., curled hair.] In bot. a cyme developed in a scorpioid or curled manner.

Cinclides. See CINCLIS.

Cinclinæ (sin-klī'nē), n. pl. [Gr. kingklos, a water-ouzel.] The dippers, a sub-family of dentirostral birds, belonging to the family Merulidæ or Turdidæ.

Cinclis (singk'lis), n. pl. Cinclides (singk'li-dēz). [Gr. kingklis, kingklidos, a lattice.] One of the openings existing in the body-walls of some sea-anemones. Probably these apertures serve to discharge the thread-cells or cnidæ.

Cinclosoma (sin-klō-sō'ma), n. [Gr. kingklos, a water-ousel, and soma, the body.] A genus of insessorial birds, nearly allied to the shrikes. C. punctatum, or spotted ground-thrush, inhabits Tasmania and Eastern Australia; other species are found in the East Indies.

Cinclus (singk'lus), n. [Gr. kingklos, a water-ouzel.] A genus of birds of the family Merulidæ, including the water-ouzel or dipper. See DIPPER.

Cincture (singk'tūr), n. [L. cinctura, from cingo, to surround, to gird.] 1. A belt, a girdle, or something worn round the body.

> Like one that shuddered, she unbound
> The cincture from beneath her breast. Coleridge.

2. That which encompasses or incloses; inclosure. 'The court and prison being within the cincture of one wall.' Bacon.—3. In arch. a ring or list round a column, especially one at the top and another at the bottom, separating the shaft at one end from the base, at the other from the capital. It is supposed to be in imitation of the girths or ferrils anciently used to strengthen columns.

Cinctured (singk'tūrd), a. Girded with a cincture. 'Their feather-cinctured chiefs and dusky loves.' Gray.

Cinder (sin'dėr), n. [A.Sax. sinder, dross, cinder; cog. Icel. sindr, Sw. sinder, slag or dross from a forge; Dan. sinder, sinner, a cinder; D. sintel, cinders; G. sinter, dross. The word is believed to be derived from a root signifying to flow, seen in Skr. sindhu, a river.] 1. A solid piece of matter, remaining after having been subjected to combustion, and in which fire is extinct; as, the cinders of a forge.—2. A small coal or particle of fire mixed with ashes; an ember. Swift.—3. A scale thrown off while forging or hammering iron.—4. Any strong liquor, as brandy, whisky, sherry, &c., mixed with a weaker beverage, as soda-water, lemonade, water, &c., to fortify it. [Slang.]

Cinder-bed (sin'dėr-bed), n. A quarryman's name for a stratum of the upper Purbeck series, almost wholly composed of oyster-shells, and so named from its loose structure. It is a marine bed lying among fresh-water deposits.

Cinder-frame (sin'dėr-frām), n. In locomotive engines, a frame of wire-work placed before the tubes, to arrest the ascent of large pieces of burning coke.

Cindering (sin'dėr-ing), p. and a. Reducing to cinders. 'Sword and cindering flame.' Gascoigne.

Cinderous, Cindrous (sin'dėr-us, sin'drus), a. Pertaining to or like a cinder. 'A sharp and cindrous humour.' Sylvester, Du Bartas.

Cinder-path (sin'dėr-path), n. A path or way laid with cinders in place of gravel.

> There was a broad cinder-path diagonally crossing a field. Mrs. Gaskell.

Cinder-sifter (sin'dėr-sif-tėr), n. One who or that which sifts cinders; specifically, a perforated shovel or sieve for sifting ashes or dust from cinders.

Cinder-wench, Cinder-woman (sin'dėr-wensh, sin'dėr-wu'man), n. A woman whose business is to rake into heaps of ashes for cinders.

> In the black form of cinder-wench she came. Gay.

Cindery (sin'dėr-i), a. Resembling cinders; containing cinders, or composed of them.

Cinefaction (sin-ē-fak'shon), n. [L. cinis, ashes, facio, to make.] Reduction to ashes.

Cinematic, Cinematics (sī-nē-mat'ik, sī-nē-mat'iks), n. Same as Kinematic, Kinematics.

Cinematograph (sin-e-mat'o-graf), n. [Gr. kinēma, kinēmatos, movement, graphō, to delineate.] An apparatus by which a series of successive instantaneous photographs of moving objects are thrown on a screen by a lantern, giving a most realistic effect.

Cinenchyma (si-nen'ki-ma), n. [Gr. kineō, to move, enchyma, infusion—en, in, cheō, to pour.] In bot. the laticiferous tissue in plants. See LATICIFEROUS.

Cinenchymatous (si-nen-kim'at-us), a. Pertaining to cinenchyma, laticiferous.

Cineraceous, Cinereous (sin-e-rā'shus, sī-nē'rē-us), a. [L. cinereus, cineraceus, from cinis, cineris, ashes.] Like ashes; having the colour of the ashes of wood.

Cineraria (sin-e-rā'ri-a), n. [L. cinis, cineris, ashes: from the soft white down which covers the surfaces of the leaves.] A genus of plants, natural order Compositæ, consisting of herbs or small shrubs, with small-sized heads of yellow flowers. They are chiefly found in South Africa, and in our gardens there are a number of varieties, induced by cultivation.

Cineraria (garden variety).

Cinerary (sin'e-rar-i), a. [L. cinerarius, from cinis, cineris, ashes.] 1. Pertaining to ashes.—2. In archæol. a term applied to the sepulchral urns in which the ashes of bodies which had been burned were deposited.

Cineration (sin-e-rā'shon), n. [From L. cinis, ashes.] The reducing of anything to ashes by combustion.

Cinereous, a. See CINERACEOUS.

Cineritious (sin-e-ri'shus), a. [L. cineritius. See CINERARY.] 1. Having the colour or consistence of ashes; ash-gray.—2. In anat. a term applied to the exterior or cortical part of the brain. The cineritious tubercle is the floor of the third ventricle of the brain.

Cinerulent† (si-ner'ū-lent), a. Full of ashes. Bailey.

Cingalese (sing'ga-lēz), a. Pertaining to the primitive inhabitants of Ceylon, or to the island itself. Also written Singhalese.

Cingalese (sing'ga-lēz), n. sing. and pl. A member of the primitive race inhabiting Ceylon; the primitive races of Ceylon collectively.

Cingle† (sing'gl), n. [L. cingulum, from cingo, to gird.] A girth. See SURCINGLE.

Cingulum (sing'gū-lum), n. [L., a belt or girdle.] 1. Eccles. the girdle with which the alb of a priest is gathered in at the waist.—2. In zool. a term applied to the neck of a tooth, or that more or less distinct constriction which separates the crown from the fang.

Ciniflonidæ (sin-i-flon'i-dē), n. pl. [L. ciniflo, a hair-curler, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] A family of spiders, several species of which are common in England, residing in crevices of rocks and walls, &c., or under leaves or old bark, weaving nets of a most elaborate description, connected with their retreat by means of a tunnel, through which the animal darts when it feels the vibration of an insect in the web. The Ciniflo ferox, a very voracious species, may be mentioned as typical.

Cinnabar (sin'na-bär), n. [L. cinnabaris, Gr. kinnabari, a word of Eastern origin; Per. qinbár.] (HgS.) 1. Red sulphide of mercury. Native cinnabar is a compact, very heavy amorphous mineral, which occurs in Spain, Hungary, Chili, Mexico, Japan, &c. Artificial cinnabar is of crystalline structure, and is prepared by subliming the amorphous sulphide; it is used as a pigment, and is also called vermilion. Hepatic cinnabar, an impure variety of a liver-brown colour and sub-metallic lustre. Dana.—2. A red resinous juice obtained from an East Indian tree (Calamus Draco), formerly used as an astringent; dragon's-blood.

Cinnabaric, Cinnabarine (sin'na-bär-ik, sin'na-bär-in), a. Pertaining to cinnabar; consisting of cinnabar or containing it; as, cinnabarine sand.

Cinnamic, Cinnamomic (sin-nam'ik, sin-na-mom'ik), a. Pertaining to or obtained from cinnamon.

Cinnamomum (sin-na-mō'mum), n. [See below.] A genus of plants, nat. order Lauraceæ, natives of tropical Asia and the Polynesian Islands. They have ribbed leaves, and a six-cleft calyx with nine stamens in three rows; each anther has four cells which open inwardly, except in the outer row. All the species possess an aromatic volatile oil. Two of the species yield cinnamon and cassia-lignea. See CINNAMON and CASSIA.

Cinnamon (sin'na-mon), n. [L. cinnamomum; from Gr. kinnamōmon, through Phœn. from Heb. kinnamon.] 1. The name given to trees of the genus Cinnamomum, especially to C. zeylanicum. This tree is cultivated for its bark in Ceylon, the Malabar coast, Sumatra, and Borneo. It is sometimes confounded with C. Cassia, which yields the Chinese or common variety of cassia-lignea.

2. The inner bark of C. zeylanicum. It is stripped off the branches, and in drying it takes the form of rolls called quills, the smaller quills being introduced as they are drying into the larger ones. The true cinnamon is a grateful aromatic, of a fragrant smell, moderately pungent taste, accompanied with some degree of sweetness and astringency. It is one of the best cordial, carminative, and restorative spices. The bark of C. Cassia, being cheaper, is often substituted for true cinnamon, but it is thicker, coarser, and less delicate in flavour. —Oil of cinnamon, an oil obtained from the bark of different trees of the genus Cinnamomum. The oil consists chiefly of cinnamic aldehyde (C_9H_8O), mixed with various resins.—Clove cinnamon is the bark of a tree growing in Brazil (Dicypellium caryophyllatum), which is often substituted for real cloves.—White cinnamon or Canella alba, is the bark of a tree growing in the West Indies, of a sharp, biting taste, like pepper.

Cinnamon (Cinnamomum zeylanicum).

Cinnamon-stone (sin'na-mon-stōn), n. A variety of garnet of a cinnamon, hyacinth-red, yellowish-brown, or honey-yellow colour, sometimes used in jewelry.

Cinnamon-water (sin'na-mon-wą-tėr), n. A medicinal beverage obtained by distilling cinnamon, first infused in barley-water, in spirit of wine, brandy, or white wine.

Cinnamyl, Cinnamyle (sin'na-mil), n. (C_9H_7O.) A substance supposed to exist in a series of compounds, such as cinnamic acid, cinnamic aldehyde, &c.

Cinnyridæ (sin-nir'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kinnyris, a small bird, and eidos, likeness.] A family of insessorial birds remarkable for the splendid metallic lustre of their plumage; the sun-birds. The family derives its name from the typical genus Cinnyris. See SUN-BIRD.

Cinque (singk), n. [Fr., five.] A five: a word used in games.

Cinque-cento (chēn'kwā-chen-tō), n. and a. [It., lit. 500, but used as a contraction for 1500, the century in which the revival took place.] A term employed in reference to the decorative art and architecture belonging to that attempt at purification of style and reversion to classical forms introduced soon after the beginning of the sixteenth century in Italy. The term is often loosely applied to ornament of the sixteenth century in general, properly included in the term Renaissance.

What is given the student as next to Raphael's work? Cinque-cento ornament generally. Ruskin.

Cinque-foil (singk'foil), n. [Fr. cinque, L. quinque, five, and feuille, L. folium, a leaf.] 1. In arch. an ornament in the pointed style of architecture, consisting of five cuspidated divisions. Circular windows frequently have this form. See FOIL.—2. The common name of the plant Potentilla reptans, from its quinate leaves. Called also Five-finger.

Cinque-pace (singk'pās), n. [Fr. cinque, five, and pas, pace.] A kind of dance, the steps of which were regulated by the number five. Shak.

Cinque-ports (singk'pōrts), n. pl. [Fr. cinque, five.] Five ports or havens on the southern shore of England, towards France, viz. Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich; to which were afterwards added Winchelsea, Rye, and Seaford. These were anciently deemed of so much importance, in the defence of the kingdom against an invasion from France, that they received royal grants of particular privileges, on condition of providing a certain number of ships in war at their own expense. Over these is appointed a warden.

Cinque-spotted (singk'spot-ted), a. Having five spots.

On her left breast
A mole cinque-spotted, like the crimson drops
I' the bottom of a cowslip. Shak.

Cintre (sin'tėr), n. [Fr.] In arch. same as Centering.

Cion† (sī'on), n. Same as Scion (which see). Howell.

Cipers† (sī'pėrz), n. [A corruption of cyprus.] A fine black gauze; cyprus. Marston.

Ciper-tunnel† (sī'pėr-tun-nel), n. A false chimney set on a roof for ornament. Fuller.

Cipher (sī'fėr), n. [O.Fr. cifre, Mod. Fr. chiffre, It. cifra, Ar. sifr, cipher, from Ar. sifr, empty.] 1. In arith. a character of this form, 0, which, standing by itself, expresses nothing, but increases or diminishes the value of other figures, according to its position. In whole numbers, when placed at the right hand of a figure it increases its value tenfold; but in decimal fractions, placed at the left hand of a figure, it diminishes the value of that figure tenfold.—2. Fig. something of no value or consequence; especially a person of no weight, influence, usefulness, or decided character. 'The very cipher of a function.' Shak.

Here he was a mere cipher, there he was lord of the ascendant. Irving.

3. A character in general, especially a numeral character.

This wisdom began to be written in ciphers and characters. Raleigh.

4. An intertexture of letters, as the initials of a name, engraved, stamped, or written on something, as on a seal, plate, coach, tomb, picture, &c.; a literal device; a monogram.—5. A secret or disguised manner of writing; certain characters arbitrarily invented and agreed on by two or more persons, to stand for letters or words, and understood only by the persons who invent or agree to use them.—6. Anything written in cipher.—7. The key to a cipher or secret mode of writing.

Cipher (sī'fėr), v.i. To use figures; to practise arithmetic.

'Twas certain he could write and cipher too. Goldsmith.

Cipher (sī'fėr), v.t. 1. To write in occult characters.—2.† To designate by a sign; to characterize.

Some loathsome dash, the herald will contrive,
To cipher me how fondly I did dote. Shak.

3.† To decipher. 'The illiterate, that know not how to cipher what is writ in learned books.' Shak.

Cipherer (sī'fėr-ėr), n. One who ciphers; one who practises arithmetic.

Cipherhood (sī'fėr-hụd), n. State of being a cipher; insignificance; nothingness. [Rare.]

Therefore God, to confute him and bring him to his native cipherhood, threatened to bring a sword against him. Goodwin.

Ciphering-book (sī'fėr-ing-bụk), n. A child's book in which to work arithmetical questions or enter them when worked.

Ciphering-slate (sī'fėr-ing-slāt), n. A slate on which to work arithmetical questions.

Cipher-key (sī'fėr-kē), n. A key for deciphering writings in secret styles.

Cipolin (sip'ol-in), n. [It. cipollino, from cipolla, an onion, from its being veined or stratified like an onion. See CIBOL.] A green marble from Rome, containing white zones. It consists chiefly of carbonate of lime, with quartz, talc, and a small portion of iron.

Cippus (sip'pus), n. pl. Cippi (sip'pī). [L.] 1. In Rom. antiq. a low column, generally rectangular and sculptured, and often bearing an inscription, serving as a sepulchral monument. On several such we find the letters S.T.T.L. (Sit tibi terra levis, May the earth be light to thee), on others the inscription appearing in annexed cut, and signifying 'sacred to the divine manes.' Cippi were used for other purposes. Thus the decrees of the senate were inscribed on some, others served as milestones, while others were set up to mark divisions of land.—2. A military entrenchment made of the trunks of trees and palisades.

Sepulchral Cippus.

Circ (sėrk), n. [L. circus, a circle.] A prehistoric stone circle.

Circs of the same sort are still to be seen in Cornwall. T. Warton.

Circæa (sėr-sē'a), n. [From Circe. See CIRCEAN.] A small genus of slender erect herbs, with creeping rootstocks, nat. order Onagraceæ; enchanter's nightshade. There are two British species, C. alpina and C. lutetiana. See under ENCHANTER.

Circæan (sėr-sē'an), a. See CIRCEAN.

Circar (sėr'kär), n. 1. In the East Indies, a large portion of a province; a subdivision of a soobah.—2. A sircar (which see).

Circassian (sėr-kash'i-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Circassia in Asia.—2. A woollen cloth.

Circinate (sėr'si-nāt), a. [From L. circinus, a compass, a circle, from circus, a circle.] In bot. a term applied to that mode of vernation or foliation in which the leaf is rolled up on its axis from the apex towards the base, like a shepherd's crook, as in the fronds of ferns, and the leaves of the sun-dew.

Circinate (Fern).

Circination† (sėr-si-nā'shon), n. An orbicular motion. Bailey.

Circingle† (sėr'sing-gl), n. Same as Surcingle. Beau. & Fl.

Circinus (sėr'si-nus), n. [L.] The Compasses, a modern constellation near the south pole. It consists of four stars.

Circle (sėr'kl), n. [L. circulus, dim. of circus, a circle; Gr. kirkos, krikos, a ring; same root as ring, A. Sax. hring.] 1. A plane figure, comprehended by a single curve line, called its circumference, every part of which is equally distant from a point within it called the centre.—2. The line bounding or forming such a figure, or something in a similar form; a ring; as, a circle of stones or a Druidical circle: the name is given particularly to several astronomical instruments of a circular form; as, a mural circle, a transit circle.—3. A round body; an orb; a sphere.

It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth. Is. xl. 22.

4. Compass; circuit. 'In the circle of the forest.' Shak.—5. A number of particulars regarded as having a central point; a number of persons collected around, or conceived of as collected around a central figure or point of interest; hence, a number of persons associated by some tie; a coterie; a set; as, a certain circle of ideas; to move in the higher circles of society.

As his name gradually became known the circle of his acquaintance widened. Macaulay.

Circular (sėr'kū-lėr), a. [L. circularis. See CIRCLE.] 1. In the form of a circle; round; circumscribed by a circle; as, the sun appears to be circular.—2. Passing over or forming a circle, circuit, or round; returning to the point from which a start was made; as, to take a circular tour in a country.—3. Adhering to a certain cycle of legends; cyclic: applied to a poet. See CIRCLER. [Rare.]

Had Virgil been a circular poet, and closely adhered to history, how could the Romans have had Dido? Dennis.

4. Alternating between. [Rare.]

The life of man is a perpetual war,
In misery and sorrow circular. Sandys.

5. In logic, ending in itself: used of a paralogism, where the second proposition at once proves the first and is proved by it. See CIRCLE, 9.—6. Addressed to a circle or to a number of persons having a common interest; as, a circular letter.—7.† Complete; perfect.

A man so absolute and circular,
In all those wished-for rarities that may take A virgin captive. Massinger.

—Circular arc, an arc of a circle.—Circular instruments, astronomical or nautical instruments for measuring angles in which the graduation extends round the whole circumference of a circle, or to 360°, for instance, a mural circle.—Circular loom, a loom in which the shuttle moves in a circular race and continuously in one direction through warps arranged in a circle. E. H. Knight.—Circular note, a note or letter of credit furnished by bankers to persons about to travel abroad. Along with the note the traveller receives 'a letter of indication,' bearing the names of certain foreign bankers who will cash it on presentation, on which letter he is required to write his name. On presentation the foreign banker can demand a view of the 'letter of indication,' and by requiring the presenter to write his name in his presence can compare the signature thus made with that in the letter, and so far satisfy himself whether the presenter is really the person entitled to receive the money.—Circular numbers, those whose powers terminate in the roots themselves, as 5 and 6, whose squares are 25 and 36.—Circular polarization, the name given to a supposed circular rotation in the particles of ether in certain media when a pencil of plane polarized light is allowed to pass through these media.—Circular sailing, the method of sailing by the arc of a great circle. See SAILING.—Napier's circular parts, are five parts of a right-angled or a quadrantal spherical triangle; they are the legs, the complement of the hypotenuse, and the complements of the two oblique angles. If any one part be called the middle part the two next to it are the adjacent parts, and the other two the opposite. Napier's rules for the circular parts serve for the solution of all cases of right-angled spherical triangles.

Circular (sėr'kū-lėr), n. A letter or paper, generally printed or multiplied by some other rapid mechanical process, of which a copy is sent to several persons on some common business; as, a business circular; a diplomatic circular.

Cisleu (sis'lē-ō), n. See CHISLEU.

Cismontane (sis-mon'tān), a. [L. cis, on this side, and mons, a mountain.] Existing on this side of the mountain; specifically, on this side the Alps: opposed to ultramontane.

Cispadane (sis'pa-dān), a. [L. cis, on this side, and Padus, the river Po, whence Padanus.] On this side of the Po, with regard to Rome; that is, on the south side.

Cissampelos (sis-sam'pe-los), n. [Gr.—kissos, ivy, and ampelos, a vine, because it climbs like the ivy, and has fruit like the vine.] A genus of climbing plants, nat. order Menispermaceæ, one of which, the velvet leaf (C. Pareira), yields the root called Pareira brava, used in medicine as a tonic and diuretic.

Cissoid (sis'soid), n. [Gr. kissos, ivy, and eidos, form.] A curve of the second order, invented by Diocles with a view to the solution of the famous problem of the duplication of the cube, or the insertion of two mean proportionals between two given straight lines. The curve is generated in the following manner:—In the diameter, A B, of a circle described about C, take B M = A N, and erect the ordinates M Q = N R, and join A Q: the locus of the point P, in which the line A Q cuts the ordinate N R, is the cissoid. To find its equation, let A N = x, P N = y, A C = a, then since the equation is $y^2(2a-x)=x^3$. The curve has an equal branch on the other side of A B; the two branches meeting in a cusp at the point A, and have the line H K as an asymptote. The area included between the curve and the asymptote is three times the area of the generating circle. In the cissoid of Diocles the generating curve is a circle; but this term has been employed in later times to all curves described in a similar manner, where the generating curve is not a circle.

$$\frac{\text{P N}=y}{\text{A N}=x}=\frac{\text{Q M}=\sqrt{2ax-x^2}}{\text{A M}=\quad 2a\ -x}$$

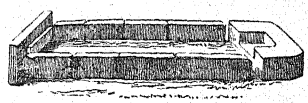
Cissoidal (sis-soid'al), a. Resembling the cissoid of Diocles, applied to mechanical curves partaking of that character.

Cissus (sis'sus), n. [Gr. kissos, ivy, in reference to their scrambling roots.] The wild grape, a group of plants included in the same genus with the true vine, but having more deeply divided leaves, and the petals of the flower opening before they fall off. All the species are climbing plants, and are mostly found within the tropics, especially in Asia; a few occur in North America.

Cist (sist), n. [From L. cista, Gr. kistē, a chest. Chest is simply another form of this word.] 1. A case; a chest; a basket; specifically, in archæol. (a) the term applied to the mystic baskets used in processions connected with the Eleusinian mysteries. (b) A place of interment of an early or prehistoric period, consisting of a stone chest formed of two parallel rows of stones fixed on their ends, and covered by similar flat stones. Such cists are found in barrows or mounds, inclosing bones. In rocky districts, cists were sometimes hewn in the rock itself.



Cist.

Called also Kist, Cistvaen, and Kistvaen.—2. Same as Cyst (which see).

Cistaceæ (sis-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. [See CISTUS.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens, consisting of low shrubby plants or herbs, with entire leaves and crumpled, generally ephemeral showy flowers. Some species exude a balsamic resin, such as ladanum, from a species of Cistus found in the countries bordering the Levant. Four species of the genus Helianthemum are found in Britain, and are commonly called rock-rose.

Cistal (sis'tal), a. A term used by Lindley to designate one of his 'alliances' of plants. They are hypogynous exogens, with monodichlamydeous flowers, and include the rock-roses (genus Cistus), crucifers, weldworts, and capparids.

Cistella (sis-tel'la), n. [L., a casket, dim. of cista, a box.] In bot. the capsular shield of some lichens.

Cistercian (sis-tėr'shi-an), n. A member of a religious order, which takes its name from its original convent, Citeaux (Cistercium), near Dijon, where the society was founded in 1098 by Robert, abbot of Solesmes, under the rule of St. Benedict. They led a contemplative and very ascetic life, and, having emancipated themselves from the oversight of the bishops, formed a sort of religious republic, under the government of a high council of twenty-five members, the abbot of Citeaux being president. In France they called themselves Bernardines, in honour of St. Bernard. From the Cistercians emanated the barefooted monks, or Feuillants in France, the nuns of Port-Royal, the Recollets in Spain, and the monks of La Trappe. The French Revolution reduced the Cistercians to a few convents in Spain, Austria, Poland, and the Saxon part of Upper Lusatia. They wear a white cassock with black scapulary, but when officiating are clothed with a large white gown, with great sleeves and a hood of the same colour.

Cistercian.—Pascal's Collection des Costumes.

Cistern (sis'tėrn), n. [L. cisterna, from cista, a chest.] 1. An artificial reservoir or receptacle for holding water, beer, or other liquor, as in domestic uses, distilleries, and breweries.—2. A natural reservoir for water; a hollow place containing water, as a fountain or lake. 'The wide cisterns of the lakes.' Sir R. Blackmore.

Cistic (sist'ik), a. See CYSTIC.

Cistus (sis'tus), n. [Gr. kistos.] The rock-rose, a genus of plants of many species, belonging to the nat. order Cistaceæ, natives of Europe, or of the countries bordering the Mediterranean. Some of them are beautiful evergreen flowering shrubs, and ornamental in gardens. Gum ladanum is obtained from C. creticus and C. ladaniferus.

Cistvaen, Kistvaen (kist'va-en or kist'vān), n. See CIST.

Cit (sit), n. [Contracted from citizen.] A citizen; an inhabitant of a city: used in disparagement. 'The cits of London and the boors of Middlesex.' Johnson. [Colloq.]

Citable (sīt'a-bl), a. Capable of being cited or quoted.

Citadel (sit'a-del), n. [Fr. citadelle, from It. citta, city.] A fortress or castle in or near a city, intended to keep the inhabitants in subjection, or, in case of a siege, to form a final point of defence. 'Troas and Ilion's columned citadel.' Tennyson.

Cital (sī'tal), n. 1. The act of citing to appear; a summons. [Rare.]—2. Mention. [Rare.]

He made a blushing cital of himself. Shak.

3.† Quotation; citation. Johnson.

Citation (sī-tā'shon), n. [L. citatio, from cito, to cite (which see).] 1. A summons; an official call or notice given to a person to appear in a court, and answer to a demand; a call or notice to appear, in various other cases, and the paper containing such notice or call.

The remonstrants were ready according to their citation. Sir M. Hale.

2. The act of citing a passage from a book; or from another person, in his own words; also the passage or words quoted; quotation.

It is the beauty and independent worth of the citations, far more than their appropriateness, which have made Johnson's dictionary popular even as a reading-book. Coleridge.

3. Specifically, in law, a reference to decided cases or books of authority to maintain a point of law.—4.† Enumeration; mention. Harvey.

Citator (sī-tā'tėr), n. One who cites. [Rare.]

Citatory (sī'ta-to-ri), a. Citing; calling; having the power or form of citation. 'Letters citatory.' Ayliffe.

Cite (sīt), v.t. pret. & pp. cited; ppr. citing, [Fr. citer, from L. cito, citare, freq. of cieo, to call, to summon.] 1. To call upon officially or authoritatively to appear; to summon before a person or tribunal; to give legal or official notice to appear in court to answer or defend.

The cited dead
Of all past ages, to the general doom
Shall hasten. Milton.

2. To enjoin; to direct; to summon; to call; to order or urge; to rouse. [Rare.]

And had I not been cited so by them
Yet did I purpose as they do entreat. Shak.

3. To quote; to name or repeat, as a passage or the words of another, either from a book or from verbal communication.

The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose. Shak.

4. To refer to in support, proof, or confirmation; as, to cite an authority or a precedent in proof of a point in law.—5.† To mention; to recount.

We cite our faults
That they may hold excused our lawless lives.
Shak.

6.† To bespeak; to argue; to evidence. 'Aged honour cites a virtuous youth.' Shak.

Citee,† Cite,† n. A city. Chaucer.

Citer (sīt'ėr), n. One who cites: (a) one who summons into court. (b) One who quotes.

Citess (sit'es), n. [See CIT.] A city woman. Dryden. [Rare.]

Cithara (sith'a-ra), n. [L., from Gr. kithara, whence cittern, gittern, guitar.] An ancient stringed instrument resembling the more modern cittern, or guitar. It is mentioned by Homer.

Cithara, from an Egyptian painting.

Citharexylon (sith-a-reks'i-lon), n. [Gr. kithara, the lyre, and xylon, wood.] Fiddle-wood, a genus of plants, nat. order Verbenaceæ. The species are trees or shrubs, natives of South America and Jamaica.

Citharist (sith'ar-ist), n. A player on the cithara.

Citharistic (sith-ar-ist'ik), a. Pertaining to or adapted to the cithara.

Cithern (sith'ėrn), n. Same as Cittern (which see).

Citicism† (sit'i-sizm), n. [From cit.] The manners of a cit or citizen. B. Jonson. [Rare.]

Citied (sit'id), a. 1. Belonging to a city; having the qualities of a city. 'The loathsome airs of smoky citied towns.' Drayton. [Rare.]—2. Occupied by a city or cities; covered with cities. 'The citied earth.' Keats.

Citigrade (sit'i-grād), a. [L. citus, swift, and gradus, a step.] Swiftly moving, specifically applied to a tribe of spiders remarkable for the nimbleness of their motions.

Citiner† (sit'i-nėr), n. One born or bred in a city; a cit. Chapman.

Citizen (sit'i-zen), n. [O.E. citesein, citezein, citesain, &c., from O.Fr. citeain, citain, citeien, &c. (Mod. Fr. citoyen), from cité, a city. The z (or s) is a corruption of the old symbol used for y. See CITY.] 1. The native of a city, or an inhabitant who enjoys the freedom and privileges of the city in which he resides; the freeman of a city, as distinguished from a foreigner, or one not entitled to its franchises.—2. Any inhabitant of a town or city, as opposed to the inhabitant of a rural district; sometimes, in disparagement, a person engaged in trade, as opposed to a person of birth and breeding. 3. A member of a state with full political privileges.

If the citizens of the United States should not be free and happy the fault will be entirely their own. Washington.

Citizen (sit'i-zen), a. Having the qualities of a citizen; town-bred; effeminate. [Rare.]

I am not . . . so citizen a wanton as to seem to die ere sick. Shak.

Citizeness (sit'i-zen-es), n. A female citizen.

Citizenize (sit'i-zen-īz), v.t. To make a citizen; to admit to the rights and privileges of a citizen. [Rare.]

Talleyrand was citizenized in Pennsylvania when there in the form of an emigrant. T. Pickering.

Citizenship (sit'i-zen-ship), n. The state of being vested with the rights and privileges of a citizen.

Our citizenship, as saith the apostle, is in heaven. Horne.

Citizen-soldier (sit'i-zen-sōl'jėr), n. One who is both a citizen or a civilian and a soldier, as the volunteers of Great Britain.

Citole† (sit'ōl), n. [O.Sp. citola, a cithern.] A musical instrument; a dulcimer.

Citrate (sit'rāt), n. [L. citrus, a citron or lemon.] In chem. a salt of citric acid.

Citrean (sit'rē-an), a. Citrine.

Citric (sit'rik), a. Belonging to or derived from lemons or citrons.—Citric acid ($C_6H_8O_7$), the acid of lemons. Citric acid is contained in several fruits, but in the largest quantity in limes and lemons, the latter containing about 5½ per cent. It is colourless, inodorous, and extremely sharp in its taste. It is used as a discharge in calico-printing, and as a substitute for lemon in making saline draughts.

Citril-finch (sit'ril-finsh), n. [A corruption of the specific name meaning lemon-yellow, from L. citrus, a citron.] A beautiful song-bird of Italy (Fringilla citrinella): so called from the colour of its breast.

Citrination (sit-ri-nā'shon), n. The process of becoming of the colour of citrine; the state of being so coloured.

Citrine (sit'rin), a. [L. citrinus, from citrus, a lemon or citron.] Like a citron or lemon; of a lemon colour; yellow or greenish-yellow.—Citrine ointment, the common name of the ointment of nitrate of mercury. It consists of 4 parts of mercury, 12 nitric acid, 15 prepared lead, and 32 olive-oil.

Citrine (sit'rin), n. 1. Lemon colour.—2. A yellow pellucid variety of quartz. Dana.

Citron (sit'ron), n. [Fr. citron; L. citreum, from citrus, the lemon or citron.] The fruit of the citron-tree, a large species of lemon; the tree itself.

Citron-tree (sit'ron-trē), n. The tree which produces the citron (Citrus medica). It has an upright smooth stem, with a branchy head, rising from 5 to 15 feet, adorned with large, oval, spear-shaped leaves.

Citron-water (sit'ron-wa-tėr), n. A liquor distilled from the rind of citrons.

Citrul, Citrule (sit'rul), n. [See CITRULLUS.] The water-melon (Cucumis Citrullus), so named from its yellow colour.

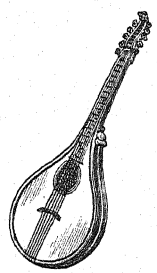
Citrullus (si-trul'lus), n. [A dim. formed from the L. citrus, the citron-tree: so called from the colour of the fruit when cut.] A genus of dicotyledonous, herbaceous, annual plants, nat. order Cucurbitaceæ. C. Colocynthis yields the well-known cathartic drug called colocynth (which see).

Citrus (sit'rus), n. [L.] A genus of plants, nat. order Aurantiaceæ, consisting of trees, with apparently simple, ovate, acuminate leaves, which are leaflets united by a distinct joint to the leaf-like stalk. The numerous stamens are irregularly united by their filaments into several irregular bundles. The fruit is pulpy, with a spongy rind. To this genus belong the orange, lemon, citron, &c.



Cittern, in South Kensington Museum.

Cittern (sit'tėrn), n. [From L. cithara. See CITHARA.] An old instrument of the guitar kind, strung with wire instead of gut. It had frequently a head grotesquely carved at the extremity of the neck and finger-board, which explains several allusions in our old plays; while the fact that in barbers' shops there was regularly one or more citterns for the use of the customers explains others. Written also Cithern.

City (sit'i), n. [Fr. cité; It. citta; L. civitas, civitatis, a city, state, from civis, a citizen.] 1. In a general sense, a large and important town; any town holding an important position in the state in which it is situated; in a narrower sense and as regards Great Britain, a city is said to be a town corporate that is or has been the seat of a bishop and of a cathedral church. Yet (as is remarked in Stephen's Commentaries) there seems to be no necessary connection between a city and a see; possibly the words were popularly thought to be etymologically connected. In America a city is a town incorporated and governed by a mayor and aldermen. The word is often used, like town, in opposition to country.—2. The inhabitants of a city collectively.

I do suspect I have done some offence
That seems disgracious in the city's eyes. Shak.

City (sit'i), a. Pertaining to a city; as, a city feast; city manners. 'City wives.' Shak. 'A city clerk, but gently born.' Tennyson.—City article, in newspapers, the editorial remarks or summary of the commercial or financial news of the day.—City editor, the journalist whose duty it is to superintend the preparation of the city article.—City court, in the United States, the municipal court of a city, consisting of the mayor or recorder and aldermen.

City-ward (sit'i-ward), n. A watchman, or the collective watchmen of a city. Fairfax.

Cive (sīv), n. [Fr. cive, L. cepa, an onion.] A small perennial garden plant (Allium Schœnoprasum), of the same genus as the leek and onion, cultivated in kitchen-gardens as a pot-herb. Written also Chive.

The common chive or cive is indigenous to Britain, having been found in Oxfordshire as well as Argyleshire. W. B. Booth.

Civet (siv'et), n. [Fr. civette, It. zibetto, from Ar. zabad, the unctuous substance which furnishes civet.] 1. A substance, of the consistence of butter or honey, taken from the anal glands of animals of the genus Viverra, which, from this circumstance and from their resemblance to cats, are called civet-cats. It is of a clear, yellowish or brownish colour, of a strong offensive smell when undiluted, but agreeable when a small portion is mixed with another substance. It is used as a perfume.—2. The animal itself. See CIVET-CAT.—3. In cookery, a dark, thickish stew, generally of hare or venison: so called from its scent.

Civet (siv'et), v.t. To scent with civet; to perfume. Cowper.

Civet-cat (siv'et-kat), n. A carnivorous mammal of the genus Viverra, having a large double gland between the anus and organs of generation, containing the peculiar odoriferous fatty substance called civet. This animal, intermediate in form between the weasel and fox, is of a cinereous colour, tinged with yellow, marked with dusky spots disposed in rows, and is commonly from 2 to 3 feet long and 10 inches high. The species are found in North Africa (V. civetta), and in Asia (V. zibetha) from Arabia to Malabar and Java (V. Rasse). They are frequently kept in confinement, especially at the town of Eufras, in Abyssinia—the principal seat of the civet trade—for the sake of the perfume, which is taken from the bag twice a week, a dram being a large yield. When thus kept they are fed on raw flesh with the view of increasing the quantity of civet.

Civic (siv'ik), a. [L. civicus, from civis, a citizen.] Pertaining to a city or citizen; relating to civil affairs or honours. 'At civic revel, pomp, and game.' Tennyson.—Civic crown, in Rom. antiq. a crown or garland of oak leaves bestowed on a soldier who has saved the life of a citizen in battle.

Civical† (siv'ik-al), a. Civic. Sir T. Browne.

Civil (siv'il), a. [L. civilis, from civis, a citizen.] 1. Relating to the community, or to the policy and government of the citizens and subjects of a state: opposed to criminal, ecclesiastical, and military or naval; as in the phrases civil rights, civil government, civil privileges, civil war, civil justice. 2. Reduced to order, rule, and government; under a regular administration; exhibiting some refinement of manners; not savage or wild; civilized; as, civil life; civil society.

Men that are civil do lead their lives after one common law, appointing them what to do. Hooker.

3. Courteous; obliging; well bred; affable; polite.

A civil man now is one observant of slight external courtesies in the mutual intercourse between man and man; a civil man once was one who fulfilled all the duties and obligations flowing from his position as a 'civis.' Abp. Trench.

4.† Grave; sober; not gay or showy.

A civil habit oft covers a good man. Beau. & Fl.

—Civil death. See DEATH.—Civil engineering. See ENGINEERING.—Civil law, the law of a state, city, or country; more specifically, the Roman law, the municipal law of the Roman Empire, comprised in the Institutes, Code, and Digest of Justinian, and the Novel Constitutions.—Civil list. See LIST.—Civil service, a term applied to that branch of the public service in which the non-military covenanted servants of the crown are employed, or to those persons collectively. It includes the offices or departments connected with the war-office, admiralty, post-office, customs, excise, diplomatic corps, civil and criminal courts, prisons, British Museum, &c.—Civil state, the whole body of the citizens who are not included in the military, naval, and ecclesiastical bodies.—Civil war, a war between the people of the same state or city: opposed to foreign war.—Civil year. See under YEAR.—Civil, Polite, Courteous. See POLITE.

Civilation (siv-i-lā'shon), n. [A corruption of civilization, or formed from the adjective civil.] An Irish slang word for intoxication. 'In a state of civilation.' De Quincey.

Civilian (si-vil'i-an), n. 1. One who is skilled in the Roman or civil law; a professor or doctor of civil law.

Elizabeth caused an inquiry to be instituted before a commission of privy councillors and civilians. Hallam.

2. A student of the civil law at a university.—3. One whose pursuits are those of civil life, not military or clerical. 'Army or civilian surgeons.' Times newspaper.—4.† One who, despising the righteousness of Christ, did yet follow after a certain civil righteousness, a justitia civilis of his own. Abp. Trench. 'The mere naturalist or civilian, by whom I mean such an one as lives upon dregs, the very reliques and ruins of the image of God decayed.' Daniel Rogers.

Civilist (siv'il-ist), n. A civilian or person versed in the civil law. Warburton.

Civility (si-vil'i-ti), n. [L. civilitas, from civilis, civil, from civis, a citizen; It. civilita; Sp. civilidad.] 1.† The state of being civilized; refinement of manners; civilization. See extract under CIVILIZATION.

Divers great monarchies have risen from barbarism to civility, and fallen again to ruin. Sir J. Davies.

2. Good breeding; politeness, or an act of politeness; courtesy; kind attention; as, to show one many civilities. 'The sweet civilities of life.' Dryden. 'The insolent civility of a proud man.' Chesterfield.

I call my own self wild,
But keep a touch of sweet civility. Tennyson.

Civilizable (siv'il-īz-a-bl), a. Capable of being civilized.

Civilization (siv'il-iz-ā''shon), n. 1. The act of civilizing, or the state of being civilized; the state of being refined in manners from the rudeness of savage life, and improved in arts and learning.

I asked him (Johnson) if 'humiliating' was a good word. He said he had seen it frequently used, but he did not know it to be legitimate English. He would not admit 'civilization,' but only 'civility.' Boswell.

2.† The act of rendering a criminal process civil.

Civilize (siv'il-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. civilized; ppr. civilizing. [From civil; Fr. civiliser, formerly written also civilizer, to civilize.] 1. To reclaim from a savage state; to introduce order and civic organization among; to refine and enlighten; to elevate in social life.

We send the graces and the muses forth,
To civilize and to instruct the North. Waller.

2.† To make subject to a civil instead of a criminal process.

Civilized (siv'il-īzd), p. and a. Reclaimed from savage life and manners; possessing some culture or refinement; refined; cultivated.

Such sale of conscience and duty in open market is not reconcilable with the present state of civilized society. Quincy.

Civilizer (siv'il-īz-ėr), n. One who or that which civilizes or tends to civilize.

Civilly (siv'il-li), adv. In a civil manner: (a) in a manner relating to government, or to the rights or character of a member of the community; in accordance with a state of civilization.

That a multitude should, without harmony, concur in the doing of one thing—for this is civilly to live—is impossible. Hooker.

(b) In a manner relating to private rights: opposed to criminally. 'A process civilly commenced for the private satisfaction of a party injured.' Aylife. (c) Not naturally, but in law; as, a man civilly dead. (d) Politely; complacently; gently; with due decorum; courteously.

I will deal civilly with his poems: nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead. Dryden.

(e)† Without gaudy colours or finery; soberly.

The chambers were handsome and cheerfull, and furnished civilly. Bacon.

Civil-suited† (siv'il-sūt-ed), a. Modestly, as opposed to gaudily or showily arrayed. 'Civil-suited morn.' Milton.

Civism (siv'izm), n. [Fr. civisme, from L. civis, a citizen.] The privileges or state of a citizen; citizenship. [Rare.]

Cizar† (siz'ėr), v.t. To clip or trim with scissors. Beau. & Fl.

Cizars† (siz'ėrz), n. pl. Scissors. Swift.

Cize† (siz), n. Size. 'Cize or figure.' N. Grew.

Clabber† (klab'ėr), n. Milk turned and become thick or inspissated; bonny-clabber (which see).

Clachan (clach'an), n. [Gael., from clach, a stone. The primary meaning probably is a stone circle for sacred or sepulchral uses.] In Scotland, a small village or hamlet; especially one in which there is a parish church. 'The clachan of Aberfoyle.' Sir W. Scott.

Clack (klak), v.i. [An imitative word; comp. Fr. claque, a clap or clack; W. clec, a sharp noise; D. klakken, to clap; M.H.G. klac, a crack; E. clap, crack.] 1. To make a sudden sharp noise, as by striking or cracking; to crack; to rattle; to click.

The palace bang'd and buzz'd and clackt. Tennyson.

2. To utter sounds or words rapidly and continually, or with sharpness and abruptness; to let the tongue run; as, her tongue is perpetually clacking. [Colloq.]

But ah! the more the white goose laid,
It clack'd and cackled louder. Tennyson.

Clack (klak), v.t. 1. To cause to make a sharp, short sound; to rattle; to clap; as, to clack two pieces of wood together. See CLACK-DISH.—2. To speak without thought; to rattle out.

Unweighed custom makes them clack out anything their heedless fancy springs. Feltham.

Clack (klak), n. [See the verb.] 1. A sharp, abrupt sound, continually repeated, such as is made by striking an object, or by bursting or cracking; as, the clack of a mill. 2. The instrument that strikes the hopper of a grist-mill, to move or shake it, for discharging the corn.—3. A bell that rings when more corn is required to be put in. Johnson.—4. A ball-valve connected with the boiler of a locomotive. See BALL-VALVE and CLACK-BOX, 2.—5. A kind of small windmill set on the top of a pole to turn and clap on a board for the purpose of frightening away birds.—6. Continual talk; prattle; gossip; tattle. [Colloq.]

A woman's clack, if I have skill,
Sounds somewhat like a thrower's mill. Swift.

Clack-box (klak'boks), n. 1. In mach. the box in which a clack-valve works.—2. In locomotives, the box fitted on to the boiler in which a ball-valve is placed to close the orifice of the feed-pipe, and prevent steam or hot water reaching the pumps. The ball of the clack is raised from its seat by the stroke of the pump-plunger forcing water against it, which water then passes into the boiler, while the instant fall of the ball prevents egress from the boiler.

Clack-dish (klak'dish), n. A dish formerly used by mendicants, having a movable cover, which they clacked to excite the notice and sympathy of passengers, and also to signify that the dish was empty.

His use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish. Shak.

Clack-door (klak'dōr), n. A plate of iron or brass covering an aperture in the side of a clack-box. It is attached by screws, and can be removed to give access to the valve-seat or recess into which the valve fits.

Clacker (klak'ėr), n. 1. One who or that which clacks.—2. The clack of a mill; the clapper.

Clack-goose (klak'gös), n. A barnacle-goose. [Scotch.]

Clack-mill (klak'mil), n. Same as Clack, 5.

Clack-valve (klak'valv), n. A valve in pumps with a single flap, hinged at one edge, and consisting of a plate of leather a little larger than the valve aperture. The leather plate is strengthened above by a plate of iron a little larger than the opening, and below by another iron plate a little less than the opening. The valve box is generally one and a half times the diameter of the valve opening. Called also Clapper.

Clack-valve.
